that "she intends to explore the proper structure for the department in light of Hurricane Katrina, including suggestions from some that the restructuring should be postponed. But if FEMA remains a part of the department, Collins said it appears that it should at least have a 'direct report' to the secretary, as Chertoff has proposed."

The New York Times (9/14, Hulse, Shenon) reports, "As Congress prepares to take its first tentative steps toward evaluating the government response to Hurricane Katrina, Democrats and others are pressing for an independent inquiry, saying lawmakers cannot be trusted to assess their own complicity in the failures." Sen. Hillary Clinton said, "I don't think the Congress can investigate ourselves." And Sept. 11 commissioners "will echo that call on Wednesday when they release a new privately financed study that will cite failures in the federal response to the storm to argue that the government remains unprepared to deal with a catastrophic terrorist strike on American soil."

Senate To Hear Testimony From Disaster Experts. USA Today (9/14) reports, "Veterans of floods, earthquakes and tsunamis will offer advice today to a Senate committee looking into how to help victims of Hurricane Katrina in the first of an expected multitude of congressional inquiries into the disaster." USA Today notes, "Pete Wilson, who dealt with 22 natural disasters when he was governor of California, and Marc Morial, a former mayor of New Orleans who now heads the National Urban League, will testify. So will Patricia Owens, the former mayor of Grand Forks, N.D., who successfully evacuated 50,000 people when the Red River flooded in 1997."

Congress Faces Hurdles In Tackling Katrina Response. The Los Angeles Times (9/14, Hook) reports, "When a Senate committee opens hearings today on what the government did wrong in response to Hurricane Katrina, there will be a conspicuous absence at the witness table: No one who actually handled the disaster will be there." The Times continues, "Hesitant to interfere with relief operations in the storm-ravaged South, lawmakers in Washington will be left to grill veterans of past disasters. That is emblematic of how hard it is for Congress to grapple with the calamity that has washed away much of the rest of its legislative agenda." The response to Katrina "is testing Congress' ability to do something that the lumbering institution is ill-equipped to do: move quickly and decisively on a huge, bipartisan project."

And Roll Call (9/14, Preston) reports, "Congressional Republicans vowed Tuesday to move forward with their plan to form a bicameral committee to examine the response to Hurricane Katrina, even as Democrats were making it clear that launching such a joint investigation would be impossible without their blessing." Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid said "that such a committee can be created only by legislation and GOP leaders would need his party's support for it to be approved in the Senate."

Meanwhile, The Hill (9/14, Hearn) reports, "The House is moving closer to a vote on a GOP plan that would create a joint committee to investigate the government's response to Hurricane Katrina, presenting Republicans with a potentially difficult vote to support a plan Democrats have derided as a political sham." It "is shaping up to be an intense test of party loyalty." The Hill adds, "House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) said yesterday that Democrats' refusal to participate in the joint committee did not worry him." DeLay said, "No one is rejecting Democrats. ... We will go forward. I think they will be incredibly embarrassed if they don't participate because you will find that the committee will be an objective committee, doing its responsibility and really looking at everything."

Lieberman Defends Decision To Place FEMA In DHS. ABC World News Tonight (9/13, lead story, 2:45, Moran) reported, "Many in Washington are now saying the problem" at the root of the Federal Government's belated response to the Hurricane Katrina disaster "was with the decision to fold FEMA into the new Department of Homeland Security after 9/11." Leo Bosner, president, FEMA employees union: "Within Homeland Security, the FEMA mission, I think, has really been sort of ignored. We were pushed off to the side." Moran: "But a Democratic architect of the Homeland Security Department says the plan is sound. The execution flawed." Sen. Joseph Lieberman: "It could be that FEMA belongs right where it is but it needed better leadership. And in the years before, more financial support."

Shays Raises Concerns About US Preparedness For Disaster. At his press conference yesterday, President Bush expressed doubt about the Federal Government's ability to respond to a major terrorist attack or another massive natural disaster. ABC World News Tonight (9/13, story 2, 2:35, Ross) reported, "What the President said today echoes what leading figures in field have been saying for some time. Despite the billions spent since 9/11, the country is unprepared for most major disaster scenarios. Most of the attention has been on another terror attack on a major city, biological or nuclear. There have been frequent emergency drills. But the Congressman overseeing domestic preparedness says the government's plans ignore urban realities." Rep. Christopher Shays: "I think if there was a dirty bomb attack in any of our major cities, we would be very unprepared." Ross: "If there were a smallpox attack, the government says it now has enough vaccine for everyone in the country. But a study by the New York Academy of Medicine says the government's preparedness plans ignore human nature." There are "even more questions about readiness for a natural disasters, such as earthquakes. California is considered prepared, but not the Midwest and cities along the little-known New Madrid faultline." And "many officials say the federal government has been slow to recognize a new and potentially greater threat -- a rare and deadly strain of flu, now in Asia, but threatening to become a global epidemic and hit the US."

Homeland Security Vulnerabilities Highlighted By Response To Katrina. The Washington Post (9/14, A3, Eggen) reports, "Four years after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, the federal government has failed to enact crucial homeland security reforms that could have saved lives and improved the sluggish response to Hurricane Katrina, according to a report to be issued today by former members of the Sept. 11 commission. Local emergency officials are still unable to reliably communicate with one another during disasters, the federal government has no clear system of command and control for responding to a crisis, and authorities have faltered in enacting basic border controls designed to keep out terrorists, according to the report's findings, which commission members outlined in interviews." Former new Jersey Gov. Thomas Kean "said the bungled response to Katrina laid bare how unprepared the nation remains for a catastrophic event, whether it is another terrorist strike or a natural disaster."

Columnist Proposes BRAC As Model. Norman Ornstein in his column in Roll Call (9/14, Ornstein) suggests that "it is time to consider the Base Realignment and Closure Commission model for this important need. We all owe former Rep. Dick Armey (R-Texas) a vote of thanks for establishing the framework for dealing with base closings. It is imperfect, to be sure, but Armey found a good way to get bases closed while retaining a real role for Congress and protecting it against its worst parochial instincts. A parallel approach could work for allocating first-responder funds, hopefully channeling the money more efficiently to where it is most needed."

400 New York Court Officials Volunteer To Help Aid Katrina Victims. The New York Law Journal (9/14, Adcock) reports, "New York's Unified Court System has organized a stand-by contingent of up to 400 volunteer court officials to help the devastated legal communities of Louisiana and Mississippi, the two states hardest hit last month by Hurricane Katrina." The Journal continues, "In light of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, Chief Judge Judith S. Kaye said Monday, 'We have very special expertise, sad to say. We know what it's like to have courtrooms brought to a standstill. We lived it -- those unforgettable days and weeks when we had to figure out so many things for the first time.'" The Journal adds, "The volunteers, most veterans of 9/11, are set to offer emergency help in such areas as court security, records recovery, voice and data communications, computer networks and the creation of temporary court sites. ... The New York volunteers -- as well as commitments of equipment and money through a specially created relief fund -- have been registered with the State Emergency Management Office in Albany. Registration enables disaster-impacted states to quickly request specific assistance from other states, in accordance with the Interstate Emergency Management Assistance Compact, a federal program begun in 1996 when then-Florida Governor Lawton Chiles was unhappy with government response to Hurricane Andrew. ... Ronald Younkins, chief of operations for the Office of Court Administration, said that Gulf Coast court officials are currently assessing damage to their facilities and conducting a census of their scattered personnel."

Blanco Criticizes FEMA On Body Recovery Efforts. Knight Ridder (9/14, Fitzgerald, Tsai) reports, "Blasting federal officials for a 'lack of urgency and lack of respect,' Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco said Tuesday that the state would seize control of the task of recovering the bodies of Hurricane Katrina victims." Blanco "accused the Federal Emergency Management Agency of causing delays because the agency had failed to sign a contract with the firm hired to collect corpses and was not providing enough support for the firm's crews. FEMA spokesman David Passey responded that body recovery has always been the state's job, and federal authorities were in charge of body identification."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/13, Blitzer) reported, "There's some new tension developing apparently between state officials in Louisiana and FEMA, the Federal Emergency Management Agency, over the recovery of bodies in the wake of the disaster." CNN (Snow) added, "That tension was turned up today by the Louisiana Governor, Kathleen Blanco. She was at a photo opportunity, so she did not field questions, but she lashed out at FEMA over recovery efforts, saying that they were not moving quickly enough. At issue is a contract with a private company hired by FEMA. Its contract expires at midnight tonight. She says that she pleaded for contract resolution, that she spoke with the Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, about this last week. And she says at this point, nothing has happened. And in her words, she is angry and outraged."

Meanwhile, the Los Angeles Times (9/14, Meyer, Moore) reports, "Until now, Blanco, a Democrat, has shied away from criticizing Washington's response to the hurricane since it hit shore more than two weeks ago. The governor said she decided to go public with her criticism after promises from Washington failed to come through, including a pledge from Michael Chertoff, the secretary of Homeland Security, 'that plans would be put in place for a system of 'recovery with respect.'"

DHS IG To Investigate No-Bid Contracts. The New York Times (9/14, Shenon) reports, "The inspector general of the Department of Homeland Security said Tuesday that his office had received accusations of fraud and waste in the multibillion-dollar relief programs linked to Hurricane Katrina and would investigate how no-bid contracts were awarded to several large, politically well-connected companies. The inspector general, Richard L. Skinner, who serves as the department's internal watchdog, said in an interview that he intended to be 'extremely aggressive' in monitoring the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which will receive most of the $62 billion in disaster-response financing approved by Congress last week." Skinner "said that his investigators would focus on several no-bid contracts awarded over the last two weeks to large, politically influential companies, including the Fluor Corporation of California, a major donor to the Republican Party, and the Shaw Group of Baton Rouge, La."

The Wall Street Journal (9/14, A4, Block, Dreazen) notes, "DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff said that as the effort to save lives winds down, his department will focus on recovery challenges, including ensuring that the contracting process is conducted properly. 'We want to get aid to people who need it quickly, but we also don't want to lose sight of the importance of preserving the integrity of the process and our responsibility as stewards of the public money,' he said."

Evacuees' Medical Records Put Online. The Washington Post (9/14, A24, Krim) reports, "The federal government is making medical information on Hurricane Katrina evacuees available online to doctors, the first time private records from various pharmacies and other health care providers have been compiled into centralized databases." The move is "one step in reconstructing medical files on more than 1 million people disconnected from their regular doctors and drug stores. Officials fear that many medical records in the region, especially those that were not computerized, were lost to the storm and its aftermath."

IRS Promotes Leave-Based Donation Program. The Wall Street Journal (9/14) reports, "Officials recently disclosed a plan designed to attract more charitable donations to storm victims. The IRS plan encourages employees and employers to participate in so-called leave-based donation programs." The Journal notes, "Under such programs, an employee generally gives up unused vacation, sick or personal leave, in exchange for the employer donating the value of that time to charities helping hurricane victims. Tax lawyers say numerous companies are considering offering this leave-donation program soon."

States Seek Waivers To Give Evacuees Separate Schooling. The Wall Street Journal (9/14, Page B1, Golden) reports some states are seeking exemptions from the McKinney-Vento act requiring school districts to integrate homeless students into regular public schools, "a stance supported by the Bush administration and some private education providers." Both Utah and Texas requested exemptions in order to educate evacuees on site at Utah's Camp Williams and in Texas "at a closed Air Force base in San Antonio." But opponents "fear that nearly two decades of gains in public-school enrollment for homeless children will be wiped out" if the exemptions are granted.

USED Official To Visit Dallas Area To See Needs Of Schools In Helping Evacuees. The Dallas Morning News (9/14, Dodge) reports, Assistant U.S. Secretary of Education Tom Luce "will meet with North Texas school superintendents today to learn firsthand about the problems local schools face in educating students displaced by Hurricane Katrina." Luce "will be accompanied by Texas Education Commissioner Shirley Neeley. They also will visit some of the 90 students and families displaced by the hurricane at Madison High School in South Dallas." The superintendents "are also likely to request that the department relax its enforcement of academic requirements under the No Child Left Behind Act." Luce said that Secretary of Education Margaret "Spellings is leading a relief task force that meets twice daily to assess the immediate needs facing schools."

Stocks Markets Finish Down On Concerns Of Katrina Impact. NBC Nightly News (9/13, story 9, 0:10, Williams) reported, "A quick look at Wall Street today: Stocks finished lower. The Dow lost 85-and-a-half points on the day [to close at 10,597.44]. NASDAQ was down 11 points [to close at 2,171.75]."

The Wall Street Journal (9/14, McDonald) says stocks declined "as investors focused more on post-Katrina worries than positive economic data collected prior to the devastating hurricane and its aftermath." The market "started the day up about 3% since the hurricane slammed the Gulf Coast at the end of last month. But rising damage estimates are stoking fears that the economy and corporate profits will be dinged by higher gas prices and lower consumer spending resulting from Katrina."

Experts Say Reconstruction From Katrina Could Hurt Economy. Knight Ridder (9/14, Hall) reports, "Oddly enough, Katrina's biggest economic impact may not be the damage it left but the rapid growth it may spark next year when rebuilding begins in earnest along the Gulf Coast. That could fuel a pace of growth that adds to inflationary risks in an already strong economy. Higher interest rates are the medicine for inflation, and that could lead to higher mortgage rates, which could threaten the nation's housing boom."

Inflation Rise Fueled By Energy Cost Increases. The Washington Times/AP (9/14, Crutsinger) reports, "Surging costs for gasoline and other energy products fueled inflation at the wholesale level in August, pressure that is expected to become even more intense when the full effect of Hurricane Katrina is felt." The Labor Department Producer Price Index "jumped a sharp 0.6 percent in August following an even bigger 1 percent increase in July." And "the Commerce Department reported that oil imports reached an all-time high in July and the trade gap with China also set a record. However, the overall trade deficit improved slightly to $57.9 billion as exports rose and imports outside of energy fell."

The Wall Street Journal (9/14, Gerena-Morales) reports, "While energy prices soared during the summer, underlying inflation showed signs of stability in the weeks leading up to Hurricane Katrina. Moreover, the U.S.'s trade performance showed signs of improving." The Producer Price Index "for finished goods rose 0.6% in August from July and were 5.1% higher than a year earlier, the Labor Department said. The increase was driven largely by a burst in energy prices, much of which occurred even before the hurricane struck the Gulf Coast, disrupting energy production. Gasoline prices jumped 48% from a year earlier, the Labor Department said."

Fed Unconcerned About Economic Impact Of Katrina. The Financial Times (9/14, Balls) reports, "The US Federal Reserve is set to press ahead with its campaign of raising interest rates at its meeting next week, in spite of the economic impact of Hurricane Katrina. But there is expected to be intense discussion of whether substantial changes to the wording of the accompanying policy statement are needed." Inside the Fed "there is considerable scepticism about the need for the "compassionate" pause in the tightening campaign that some politicians have called for following the devastation in New Orleans and the surrounding region caused by Katrina. An important subject of discussion will be whether the Fed should drop its characterisation of monetary policy as 'accommodation' and whether it should maintain its guidance that it is likely to continue raising the federal funds rate at a 'measured' pace."

US Trade Deficit Narrowed In July. The Financial Times (9/14, Hughes) reports, "Record levels of exports helped shrink the US trade deficit in July, but analysts warned new peaks in energy prices are likely to widen the gap in the months ahead as the cost of imports rises." A Commerce Department report "showed a deficit of $57.9bn, down from an upwardly revised $59.5bn in June -- itself the second highest monthly gap on record."

Katrina Leads To Real Estate Boom In Surrounding Areas. The CBS Evening News (9/13, story 9, 2:05, Attkisson) reported, "In destroying miles of real estate in New Orleans, Katrina gave birth to a real estate boom nearby. Hundreds of thousands of people need new homes." Even "for those who can pay, there aren't enough to go around." It's "too soon for exact figures, but realtors say market values are rising as fast as Katrina's floodwaters, rentals are being snapped up, and oil companies are buying houses for their workers, sight unseen." Judy Burkett, President, Baton Rouge Association of Realtors: "Is it a happy market for realtors? No, it is not. There's no joy in seeing victims and people without homes."

Louisiana Landowner Profits In Katrina's Wake.

The Wall Street Journal (9/14, Cooper) says Katrina "has changed practically everything in southeast Louisiana, including the commercial real-estate market. Baton Rouge has been overwhelmed by evacuees and now hosts companies that were flooded out in New Orleans and Jefferson parishes, some 80 miles away. But for those businesses integral to the cleanup, such as power, insurance and engineering companies, towns closer to the devastation are the hottest properties around. In the early days of Katrina's aftermath, there was nowhere nearer to the action than Luling, which got raked by the western edge of the storm but is largely intact. Even before the streets were clear, logistics teams were combing over the place, snapping up every vacant hotel room and office they could find." The Journal adds that few "have benefited more from this than [Jay] Roberts, who has lived in Luling all of his life and assembled a modest real-estate empire even as the town itself struggled."

New Orleans Recovery Slowly Beginning. The CBS Evening News (9/13, story 5, 2:15, Schieffer) reported, "There are signs that New Orleans is beginning to come back to life." CBS (Pitts) added, "It was the first encouraging sign to come down from the sky over New Orleans in two weeks, the first commercial flights in or out of New Orleans International Airport since the storm hit. But like the city itself, the planes were virtually empty." Engineers are "pumping out 6.5 billion gallons of floodwater every day. Estimates are the city should dry out by mid-October." Mayor C. Ray Nagin (D) New Orleans Mayor: "We're out of nuclear crisis mode, and we're in normal day-to-day crisis mode." Pitts: "Trains are running, power's back on in nearly half the city, and the first cargo ship will be unloaded Wednesday. The port of New Orleans is the gateway to a river system serving 33 states along the Mississippi River. But there are also signs of the grim and difficult tasks ahead."

NBC Nightly News (9/13, story 3, 1:45, Williams) reported, "At the same time, there was progress reported today in the effort to pump out of the streets of New Orleans." NBC (Costello) added, "Two weeks in the fight to reclaim New Orleans from the lake and canals that drowned it, there is progress. The uptown, business district and French Quarter hope to have drinkable water by the end of the week. Repair crews still struggle to clear the debris away from sunken pumps, but 40 are running." But with "no sign of disease so far, the Mayor is anxious to reopen parts of the city to business. The city is out of money and can't make its payroll." Mayor Ray Nagin, New Orleans: "We are working very feverishly with banking institutions, with financial folk, as well as Federal officials to secure a line of credit that will sustain us at least until the end of the year." Costello: "But there was good news today: Louis Armstrong Airport reopened for passenger business, and the first cargo ship is expected to dock tonight in a city devastated by water, but desperate for the economic lifeline it provides."

ABC World News Tonight (9/13, story 3, :25, Vargas) reported, "In the hurricane zone, a milestone today. The New Orleans airport reopened for limited commercial service."

Public Figures Weigh In Rebuilding Plans. USA Today (9/14, Willing) reports that public figures "from local performers to President Bush are beginning to speak of reviving the 287-year-old city as if such a thing is inevitable. They are contemplating what urban planner Robert Lang of Virginia Tech says has 'never been done before in America': Using what could be hundreds of billions of public and private dollars to rebuild a modern city on a scale far beyond what happened in San Francisco after its 1906 earthquake, or in Chicago after its 1871 fire. ... Politicians, urban planners, business leaders and local residents with different views of a "new" New Orleans already are campaigning for their competing visions. U.S. Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., whose New Orleans home was flooded, would focus on creating a city where tax credits, housing subsidies and jobs programs would be used to encourage the return of its working class. U.S. Rep. Bobby Jindal, R-La., whose home in nearby Kenner also was damaged, would appoint a rebuilding czar and dust off plans to diversify the city's industrial base and modernize its hospitals and public housing.'

Nagin Hopes To Reopen Four Neighborhoods Soon. The New York Times (9/14, Luo) reports that New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin said yesterday he hopes to reopen four neighborhoods including the city's central business district and the French Quarter in the next few days. At the same time, "he conceded that the city's financial problems were enormous. ... Mr. Nagin said that city officials were trying hard to secure a line of credit. Many contractors who are helping the city clean up are working under the assumption that the city will get money to pay them."

Efforts To Drain Water From City Are Paying Off. Work by the Army Corps of Engineers to pump the water out of New Orleans is paying off, USA Today (9/14, Levin) reports. As of today, "perhaps half of the flooded areas have re-emerged. Temporary pumps and the giant permanent pumping stations are throwing as much as 9 billion gallons per day over the levees and out of the city."

Polluted Waters Being Pumped Into Lake Pontchartrain. The Los Angeles Times (9/14, Vartabedian, Cone) reports that the effort "is sending plumes of contaminated, brown, stinking water into Lake Pontchartrain, setting back years of effort to restore the environmentally sensitive home of Gulf Coast marine life. After festering for two weeks in neighborhoods, commercial districts and industrial zones, the water is laden with bacteria, silt, petroleum products and possibly toxic substances. City officials confirmed Tuesday that they were also releasing untreated sewage into the Mississippi River from one of two treatment plants operated by the New Orleans Sewerage and Water Board." The floodwaters "are overrun with fecal material, silt and other substances that could damage the marine environment."

New Orleans' Water Purification Plant Revived After Katrina. The Washington Post (9/14, A21, Brown) reports on efforts to resuscitate the Carrollton Water Purification Plant, a "70-acre complex of pumps and generators and pipes to draw water from the Mississippi River, treat it with purifying chemicals, filter it and send it out to the city's half-million residents." The Post adds, "The death and reanimation of the water plant is a story of ingenuity, self-reliance, loyalty and luck. It required doing something that had never been done -- the first cold start of Carrollton since it opened in 1906." The plant "normally pumps 120 million gallons a day. When a big water main breaks, moment-to-moment consumption may go up the equivalent of 10 million to 15 million gallons a day as water gushes out of the system. The plant kicks in to compensate and increases its output to maintain pressure and flow in the distribution system. Soon after the height of the storm, however, demand rose the equivalent of 40 million to 50 million gallons a day, a step-up never seen before."

New Orleans Airport Resumes Commercial Flights. The New Orleans airport has reopened to commercial flights, the AP (9/14, Nossiter) reports. While the airport was operating at only a fraction of its capacity, "the symbolic importance was not lost on a city that only days before had all but collapsed into looting and desperation." Airport officials "hope to be up to 60 flights a day within the week and back to full operation of 350 flights a day in six months."

Port Of New Orleans Reopens Sooner Than Expected. The Washington Post (9/14, D1, Alexander, Irwin) adds that the Port of New Orleans "began unloading its first cargo ship since Hurricane Katrina on Tuesday night, months sooner than was predicted, a sign that disruption to the nation's shipping capacity may be less severe than originally forecast. ... Gary P. LaGrange, chief executive of the port, said he expects it to be at 80 percent of capacity within three months. The Port of South Louisiana and Port Fourchon, on the Gulf Coast, have also partially restored service, and the Port of Pascagoula, Miss., expects to resume service by early October, according to the American Association of Port Authorities. That has made economists more optimistic about the hurricane's impact on the nation," it "doesn't mean the economy is in the clear."

Pollution In Nearby Parish May Prevent Rehabitation For Months. ABC World News Tonight (9/13, story 4, 2:30, Vargas) reported, "Next door to New Orleans, in St. Bernard Parish, the situation is very dire. It was located right next to an oil refinery and a levee, both of which breached. 70,000 people live there. And last night, they learned they may not be able to go home until next summer, if ever." ABC (Kofman) added, "The streets of St. Bernard Parish, that only weeks ago overflowed with life, are now deserted." The receding waters "have left behind a thick sludge, a noxious mixture of sea water and crude oil that spilled into the streets from a nearby refinery." Officials here say "that between the oil spill, the flood waters, and the wind damage, almost every one of the 27,000 homes in this community will have to be bulldozed."

Gulf Coast Slowly Recovering. A front page story in the Washington Post (9/14, A1, Nieves) reports that "life has noticeably improved in the five coastal counties where Katrina unleashed the brunt of her fury -- Stone, Hancock, Harrison, Jackson and Pearl River, where about 435,000 people lived and the death toll has reached 218, with 600 people reported missing. More businesses open every day, power is back to 80 percent of the buildings that could receive power and lines for gasoline are back to normal. The Gulf Coast has a future; on that, most agree. But whether it can re-create a culture that took more than 200 years to build, return with its blend of residents, black and white, rich and poor, old money and new immigrant, or will become an entirely new and unfamiliar version of itself -- that is another story."

Levees Said To Have Sustained Extensive Damage. The Los Angeles Times (9/14, Vartabedian) reports that New Orleans' levee system "has sustained heavy damage well beyond the five breaches that are widely known to have caused flooding after Hurricane Katrina, the Army Corps of Engineers said Monday." Sections of the city are now left "with little or no protection midway through the hurricane season, senior Army officials said. And rebuilding the levees will be a massive undertaking that could take years, meaning the city could be vulnerable for a long time." The New York Times (9/14, Wald) adds, "Hurricane Katrina washed away a 17-foot-tall earthen levee that had protected St. Bernard Parish, east of New Orleans, from the waters of a shipping canal, and the Army Corps of Engineers said Tuesday that the ravaged parish would be left defenseless against even small storms at least until early next year because replacing the structure would take months. In a conference call with reporters, Col. Duane P. Gapinski of the corps acknowledged that the levee might not be rebuilt even by the start of next year's hurricane season."

Canal May Have Added To New Orleans Flooding. The Washington Post (9/14, A21, Grunwald) reports that on May 19, Hassan Mashriqui, a computer modeler at Louisiana State University's Hurricane Center, had used hydrodynamic modeling to offer proof "that a 'funnel' created by the [Mississippi River] Gulf Outlet and a nearby waterway would amplify storm surges by 20 to 40 percent. He described the funnel as 'Crescent City's Trojan Horse,' carrying the Gulf of Mexico's waters into the city." In determining the cause of New Orleans' flooding, attention thus far has focused on two breached floodwalls near Lake Pontchartrain, "But now experts believe that the initial flooding that overwhelmed St. Bernard Parish and the Lower Ninth Ward of New Orleans came from the Gulf Outlet, a channel that was an ecological and economic disappointment long before Hurricane Katrina."

Confirmed Death Toll Tops 600 In Hurricane Zone. The CBS Evening News (9/13, story 4, 0:20, Schieffer) reported, "The waters in New Orleans continued to recede today and as searchers moved into new areas the death toll went up dramatically. The known dead in Louisiana rose from 279 yesterday to 423 today. In Mississippi, the toll stands now at 218 dead."

Louisiana Death Toll Rises To 423. The AP (9/14, Nossiter) reports, "Hurricane Katrina's death toll in Louisiana jumped by more than half Tuesday to 423 as recovery workers turned more of their attention to gathering up and counting the corpses in a city all but emptied out of the living." The new count was up from 279 the day before, and "how high it might go is unclear." Though authorities said last week that "the toll could be well below the dire projections," there have been "no specific estimates."

Some Troops Set To Return To Regular Duties. Pentagon officials said yesterday that about 4,000 active duty troops, two large Navy vessels and three dozen helicopters which had been working on the hurricane relief effort, will return to their regular duties. The New York Times (9/14,) calls the move "a sign that initial rescue efforts after Hurricane Katrina are coming to an end."

The AP (9/14, Burns) adds, "Maj. Gen. Bill Caldwell, commander of the 82nd Airborne, said on Monday in New Orleans that it appeared the search for city residents who still want assistance could be completed within 10 days. He said it remained to be determined by state and federal civilian authorities what tasks his soldiers would be assigned after that."

Jefferson Under Fire For Using National Guard To Retrieve Personal Items. ABC World News Tonight (9/13, story 7, Tapper) reported, "On the night of September 2nd, military sources tell ABC News, the National Guard took Congressman William Jefferson, a Democrat, on a tour of his congressional district. A Louisiana National Guard truck and at least six soldiers were dispatched. On that tour, Jefferson decided to check on his property and recover his personal belongings. Three suitcases, a box and a laptop computer, while New Orleans residents were trying to get rescued from rooftops." Rep. Jefferson: "This wasn't about me going to my house. It's about me going to my district." Tapper: "The truck had pulled up on to Jefferson's front lawn so he wouldn't have to walk in the rising water. Jefferson went into the house alone, a source says, while the soldiers waited on the porch for about an hour. According to the Louisiana National Guard, after the long wait, the truck was stuck and could not drive off."

Texas Officials Fear State Will Get Stuck With Bill For Katrina. The Dallas Morning News (9/14, Gillman) reports that as the bills for Hurricane Katrina, including rent, police overtime, meals, transportation and hospital beds, Texas officials "are becoming increasingly worried that despite a federal disaster declaration, Washington will leave Texas taxpayers stuck with huge bills. The biggest items not yet covered by Congress: up to $450 million for schools and as much as $400 million for health coverage for the 205,000 evacuees thought to be in Texas." Robert Black, spokesman for Gov. Rick Perry "noted that Texas still hasn't received $2 million it sought from the Federal Emergency Management Agency after Tropical Storm Allison four years ago."

California To Join Emergency Management Assistance Compact. The Los Angeles Times (9/14) reports that California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger signed legislation yesterday "allowing California to join 47 states in a pact to provide rescue responders and other resources to disaster locations. California's firefighters had balked at the Emergency Management Assistance Compact out of fear that they would have less legal protection and reduced death and disability benefits if they were hurt while assisting in another state. After a prolonged standoff, Schwarzenegger and Democratic legislators, in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, fashioned a compromise that protects the firefighters."

Owners Of Flooded Nursing Home Charged With Negligent Homicide. The CBS Evening News (9/13, story 2, 0:25, Schieffer) reported, "Of all the hurricane stories, perhaps none has been more shocking than the deaths of 34 elderly residents of a flooded nursing home, and then yesterday the news that 44 people died in a flooded hospital that was supposed to have been evacuated. Well, today the Louisiana attorney general announced that the operators of that nursing home, Mable and Salvador Mangano, have been charged with 34 counts of negligent homicide."

NBC Nightly News (9/13, story 2, 0:40, Williams) reported, "State officials said the owners of St. Rita's Nursing Home in St. Bernard's Parish were asked if they wanted to move the patients and did not, despite repeated storm warnings, and their inaction led to the patients' deaths in the post-Katrina flooding. Two of the facility's owners surrendered and were jailed today."

ABC World News Tonight (9/13, story 3, :25, Vargas) reported, "There was very disturbing news from the Louisiana attorney general's office. It says the owners of a nursing home, where 34 people were found dead, have been arrested and charged with 34 counts of negligent homicide."

CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 Degrees (9/13, Cooper) reported, "Louisiana's attorney general announced that the home's two owners have been arrested and were charged with 34 counts of involuntary homicide. ... The state department of health and hospitals officials say they were under the assumption that St. Rita's had filed its required evacuation plan. But as with all facilities, it was up to St. Rita's to decide when to evacuate."

The charges against the nursing home operators was widely reported in the print media with the Washington Post (9/14, A1, Whoriskey, Tyson), the New York Times (9/14, Dewan, Baker), the AP (9/14, Simpson), Knight Ridder (9/14, Gray, Bailey, Dodd), the Los Angeles Times (9/14, Powers, Riccardi) and USA Today (9/14, Parker) all reporting on it.

Authorities Investigating Deaths At Hospital. The CBS Evening News (9/13, story 3, 2:05, Schieffer) reported authorities "are trying to sort out exactly what did happen" at Memorial Hospital, where 44 patients died. CBS (Cowan) added, "Water had flooded the generators, leaving the hospital without air conditioning for four days. At least 44 of its 260 patients never made it out alive, despite doctor's best efforts." But the "nightmare was no different at other hospitals. At this medical center, the spray paint on the wall says at least 11 bodies were recovered here: Inside, an almost unimaginable wasteland of gurneys, bedpans and other biohazards too horrific to describe."

911 Calls For Aid Frequently Made In Vain. NBC Nightly News (9/13, story 4, 1:45, Williams) reported, "15 days after the hurricane and bodies are still in issue in Louisiana where the governor called for continued efforts to recover the bodies quickly and with dignity. Only now are we hearing the 911 calls to emergency dispatchers from the days the levees broke in New Orleans. The people needed help and many didn't get it."

Louisiana Prisoners Helping With Hurricane Cleanup. A front page story in the Wall Street Journal (9/14, Fields) reports, "As Louisiana digs out from Hurricane Katrina, convicts have been opening roads with axes and chainsaws and doing other useful work. At Angola State Penitentiary, near Baton Rouge, inmates produced mattresses for shelters. Some prisoners have even donated money from what little they are paid so evacuees can buy postage stamps. ... All of the prisoners who have been helping are 'trusties,' men who are given special privileges -- like getting to leave the prison grounds under supervision -- because of their exemplary disciplinary records." The Journal notes that Katrina "has resulted in neither riots nor escapes. Because the prison is surrounded by dense, forbidding woods, running away isn't much of an option. Indeed, since Katrina hit, the Louisiana state prison system has been relatively peaceful despite moving 8,000 inmates from prisons damaged by the hurricane to 13 different facilities."

DeLay Declares "Ongoing Victory" In Battle Against Spending. House Majority Leader Tom DeLay yesterday declared an "ongoing victory," in his effort to cut spending "and said there is simply no fat left to cut in the federal budget," reports the Washington Times (9/14, Fagan, Dinan) reports. DeLay "was defending Republicans' choice to borrow money and add to this year's expected $331 billion deficit to pay for Hurricane Katrina relief. Some Republicans have said Congress should make cuts in other areas, but Mr. DeLay said that doesn't seem possible." Asked if the government is running at "peak efficiency," DeLay said, "Yes, after 11 years of Republican majority we've pared it down pretty good."

Katrina, Roberts Take Much Of Congress's Attention. The Hill (9/14, Schor) reports that Congress is "consumed…by just two issues at the moment," Hurricane Katrine and Judge Roberts' confirmation hearings. "For many on the Hill, the priority most in danger of slipping through the cracks is entitlement cuts mandated by the congressional budget resolution but put off to accommodate the response to Katrina."

First Responder's Frequency Windfall Delayed With TV Bill Due To Katrina. Roll Call (9/14, Ackley) reports that once television transitions from analog to digital, "first responders such as fire, rescue and police officers stand to benefit from a windfall of new frequencies that they can use to communicate with each other when handling emergencies." While Hurricane Katrina made "their case stronger than ever," it "also has set their cause back, at least temporarily, as Congress' legislative course has been thrown into disarray" and the bill the provision is in sits on hold for, as one GOP lobbyist put it, "somewhere between a few weeks and never."

Republicans Move To Deny Democrats "Traction" On Ethics Issues. Roll Call (9/14, Duran) reports, "Cognizant of how their effective portrayal of a Democratic Party drunk with power led to their historic takeover of the House in 1994, Republicans are moving quickly to ensure that Democrats do not get traction on the ethics issue for the 2006 elections." The "Republicans, in addition to counterpunching, maintain that Democrats are talking about ethics so much because they have nothing else to say … Democratic pollster Celinda Lake said Republicans have to move aggressively to counter ethics charges because the issue hits home." Still, Brad Coker, president of the independent Mason-Dixon polling firm, said that while "individual Republican Members may be in exceptionally hot water, Democrats have a long way to go before they can truly nationalize the issue."

Ophelia Upgraded To Hurricane As It Nears North Carolina. ABC World News Tonight (9/13, story 5, :25, Vargas) reported, "Tropical Storm Ophelia was upgraded to a hurricane this afternoon, with winds up to 75 miles per hour. After Katrina, people are nervous. In the Carolinas, a mandatory evacuation has been ordered for parts of the Outer Banks. Schools have already been closed in several counties along the coast, as a precaution." The CBS Evening News (9/13, story 10, 0:20, Schieffer) reported Ophelia "could drop more than a foot of rain." NBC Nightly News (9/13, story 7, 0:30, Williams) reported Ophelia was "strong enough to create high anxiety along the barrier islands on the coast of North Carolina where it is expected to make landfall as early as tomorrow evening."

Meanwhile, the Washington Post/AP (9/14, Nowell) notes, "Unlike Hurricane Katrina's devastating charge at the Gulf Coast, the week-old Ophelia had been following a meandering path, making predictions of its landfall difficult. The hurricane center's forecasts showed it running along the coast, then veering through Pamlico Sound, crossing the Outer Banks and heading back out to sea." USA Today (9/14, O'Driscoll) adds that Ophelia "may take an entire day to cross land before spinning back out to sea." The New York Times/REU (9/14) ran a similar report.

Delta, Northwest Consider Bankruptcy Protection. The Wall Street Journal (9/14, Perez, Carey) reports that the boards of Delta Air Lines and Northwest Airlines are meeting today to decide whether to file for bankruptcy protection, which comes after the hopes of an airline industry recovery "have been crushed by the surge in oil prices and the effects of Hurricane Katrina." The anticipated filings "could make competition in the industry much tougher. Both would want to sharply reduce costs while under bankruptcy protection, which gives them greater ability to abrogate union contracts and make other radical moves."

The AP (9/14, Weber) reports, "Delta Air Lines Inc., the nation's third-largest carrier, plans to file for bankruptcy protection in New York as early as Wednesday, according to an industry consultant who has been informed of the company's plans." The AP continues, "The consultant, who was not authorized to disclose the information and thus spoke on condition of anonymity, said Delta is working with GE Commercial Finance and other creditors to arrange roughly $2 billion in debtor-in-possession financing. The money would allow the airline to operate in bankruptcy." The AP adds, "Delta, which has lost nearly $10 billion since January 2001, likely will pledge the few remaining assets not already pledged as collateral for loans as part of the bankruptcy financing agreement, the consultant said. 'There is nothing unencumbered after this,' according to this consultant. ..... The consultant said the filing was expected to come Wednesday afternoon but could be pushed to Thursday depending on when the bankruptcy financing is completed."

Competition, Fuel Prices Spur "Likely" Filing. The New York Times (9/14, Maynard) says its "likely" that two of the nation's biggest and most troubled airlines will file for bankruptcy protection. The filing "would not eliminate the challenge posed by low-fare carriers, like Southwest and JetBlue, which now carry one-third of passengers on flights within the United States. ... The low-fare airlines' growing presence, up from just 6 percent of passengers in 1990, has kept the big airlines from passing along the punishing rise in the price of jet fuel."

The Financial Times (9/14, Daniel) reports that Delta "was seen as weaker because of its larger exposure to domestic routes, more onerous pension obligations and the cash drain of renegotiating a deal with its credit card vendors." But, credit analysts "noted that Northwest had on Monday defaulted on an $18.7m payment to Mesaba, a regional feeder airline, and saw this as a signal that it was also close to filing."

Bush Returns Focus To Foreign Affairs, Meets With China's Hu. The Washington Post (9/14, A4, Baker) reports that "after nearly two weeks consumed by Hurricane Katrina, President Bush turned his attention back to the rest of the world Tuesday and confronted again the vexing challenges of an intractable war in Iraq, disputes with Iran and North Korea, and fitful relations with the United Nations. Bush played host to Iraq's first democratically selected president at the White House in the morning and persuaded him to abandon talk of imminent U.S. troop pullouts. Bush then flew to New York in the afternoon to attend a division-plagued U.N. summit and to solicit Chinese help in pressuring Pyongyang and Tehran to abandon nuclear weapons ambitions." The "full day of diplomacy marked the first time that Bush has resumed a normal schedule since clearing his calendar after the devastation wrought by Katrina along the Gulf Coast." Bush "canceled a pomp-filled visit by Chinese President Hu Jintao last week to concentrate on getting relief to storm-ravaged areas," but "began to make it up to Hu by meeting with him here Tuesday evening, one of the first sit-down sessions with another world leader since the crisis. The rest of the week is jammed with other foreign policy events, including meetings Wednesday with the prime ministers of Britain and Israel, a U.N. gathering of 170 world leaders and a White House summit Friday with Russian President Vladimir Putin."

The New York Times (9/14, Sanger) also reports that "for the first time since the Hurricane Katrina crisis, President Bush returned yesterday to dealing with festering global problems." Bush's "meeting with Mr. Hu was delayed a week by the hurricane, and was the first in a series planned for coming months, including a trip by Mr. Bush to China in November. When the session finally took place yesterday at the Waldorf-Astoria, Mr. Bush was lobbying hard to persuade Mr. Hu -- who has nurtured a close relationship with Iran -- not to block action by the International Atomic Energy Agency next week to refer Iran's work on uranium enrichment to the Security Council."

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution/AP (9/14, Hunt) reports that Bush "won a pledge" from Hu to "step up pressure on North Korea to abandon its nuclear weapons, but the two leaders remained apart Tuesday over whether to seek international sanctions against Iran." Bush said his discussions with Hu "ranged from how to prevent an avian flu pandemic to economic matters and feared nuclear proliferation in North Korea and Iran. He seemed pleased when Hu said, 'We stand ready to step up our communication and cooperation' to gain fresh progress in negotiations with North Korea."

The Wall Street Journal (9/14, A8, King) reports that Hu told Bush that China "was prepared to take 'effective measures' to ease the soaring U.S. trade deficit with China while also moving to crack down on rampant piracy problems at home. The U.S. last year imported $162 billion more from China than it exported to China. U.S. officials said that Mr. Hu's remarks on intellectual-property protection were particularly important, and among the strongest assurances on that front that any Chinese leader has ever offered. Mr. Hu said that on the whole, relations between the two countries were 'developing quite well,' although he conceded that the rapid growth in bilateral trade had created 'some frictions' between the two economic powers."

Diplomats Concerned Katrina Response Will Distract US International Focus. Knight Ridder (9/14, Strobel) reports, "Katrina's main impact on foreign policy could be to simply divert the Bush administration's focus more toward domestic concerns." His "visit to the United Nations is sandwiched between two trips to the Gulf Coast." The President and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "have been bombarded with questions about Katrina and race issues. And diplomats from the Middle East and elsewhere say they are beginning to worry about sustained U.S. attention to their region."

Bush To Address UN General Assembly. The CBS Evening News (9/13, story 11, 0:30, Schieffer) was the only network to report that President Bush is "in New York tonight preparing to address the UN General Assembly tomorrow morning."

US Intelligence Experts Briefed China, India On Iran Missile Plans. The Wall Street Journal (9/14, A3, Robbins) reports, "As the U.S. and Europe prepare to face off with Iran at the United Nations, the Bush administration dispatched intelligence experts to China and India last week to brief them on Tehran's alleged efforts to develop a missile capable of delivering a nuclear warhead. The decision to share the highly classified intelligence is a measure of the resistance the U.S. is meeting as it pushes, along with the Europeans, for Iran's nuclear activities to be referred to the U.N. Security Council. Even after Tehran resumed some sensitive nuclear activities last month and ended negotiations with the Europeans, the U.S. and its allies face a challenge persuading China, Russia and other key nations that the situation is grave enough -- or Iran's weapons program advanced enough -- for international reprisals."

Administration Using PowerPoint Presentation To Make Case Against Iran. The Washington Post (9/14, A7, Linzer) reports, "With an hour-long slide show that blends satellite imagery with disquieting assumptions about Iran's nuclear energy program, Bush administration officials have been trying to convince allies that Tehran is on a fast track toward nuclear weapons. The PowerPoint briefing, titled 'A History of Concealment and Deception,' has been presented to diplomats from more than a dozen countries. Several diplomats said the presentation, intended to win allies for increasing pressure on the Iranian government, dismisses ambiguities in the evidence about Iran's intentions and omits alternative explanations under debate among intelligence analysts."

Ex-IAEA Official Says Security Council Should Authorize Action. In a New York Times (9/14) op-ed, former IAEA Deputy Director General Pierre Goldschmidt writes that under IAEA statute, "there is no deadline or expiration date after which noncompliance becomes moot. Thus, Iran is still accountable for its past breaches. And Iran's resumption of work related to uranium conversion eliminates the only reason for" France, Germany, and the UK "not to report Iran to the Security Council. A failure by the board to make such a report would considerably weaken the agency and the global nonproliferation regime. It would reveal that the world is unwilling to hold rule-breakers to account, inviting proliferation by other countries. ... It is time for the International Atomic Energy Agency to get the authority it needs from the Security Council to complete the verification that Iran's nuclear program is and has been, as claimed, exclusively for peaceful purposes."

As Talks Resume, North Korea Insists On Right To Nuclear Power. The Wall Street Journal (9/14, A18, Fairclough) reports that "talks aimed at persuading North Korea to give up its nuclear ambitions resumed with no public sign of progress toward a compromise between Washington and Pyongyang on a central issue: whether the North should be allowed to develop atomic energy. North Korea's chief delegate to the talks, Kim Kye Gwan, insisted that his country won't give up its right to nuclear power, despite American demands that Pyongyang dismantle all of its atomic programs, military and civilian." Still, the AP (9/14, Herman) adds that Kim said North Korea "would attend the talks with a sincere and flexible attitude."

The Washington Post (9/14, A28, Cody) reports that Kim's remarks "suggested continued difficulties in the talks despite renewed pledges from all participants to show flexibility and goodwill. The talks among China, North and South Korea, Japan, Russia and the United States are aimed at the stated goal of achieving a nuclear-free Korean Peninsula. The issue of peaceful nuclear energy was a major reason the last round was suspended Aug. 7, after 13 days of intense bargaining." The Bush Administration "remains adamant that North Korea must abandon its nuclear weapons programs and forgo nuclear energy production." But as the Washington Times (9/14, Salmon) reports, the "US position is complicated by Chinese and South Korean support for civil atomic energy use by North Korea on the condition that it abandon nuclear weapons."

The Christian Science Monitor (9/14, Regan) reports that the US "rejected North Korea's stance. US chief negotiator Christopher Hill said Monday in Beijing that North Korea's position 'does seem to be wrong.' Still, US negotiators said they will renew efforts to convince North Korea to give up its civilian reactors at the talks."

US, South Korea Hold Preliminary Talks On Bilateral Trade Accord. The Financial Times (9/14, de Jonquières, Fifield) reports that "US and South Korean officials are holding preparatory talks on a bilateral trade agreement, potentially paving the way" for President Bush to "launch formal negotiations when he visits the country in November. A deal with Asia's third biggest economy would give the US an important economic bridgehead into the region."

"Widespread Disappointment" With "Gutted" UN Statement Of Goals. The New York Times (9/14, Hoge) reports, "The General Assembly unanimously approved a scaled-down statement of goals on Tuesday," amidst "widespread disappointment at the weakening of the 35-page document."

The Los Angeles Times (9/14, Farley) adds that because "the secretary-general is treated more like an employee of the member nations than their leader" and "a culture of consensus allowed a handful of nations with entrenched interests to shape the outcome," after "weeks of bitter negotiations," many of Annan's boldest reform proposals were "eviscerated."

The Washington Post (9/14, A6, Lynch, Kessler) adds that delegates "voiced relief that the entire process had not collapsed, which would have left the summit with no tangible result, and they highlighted relatively modest achievements in the document" which includes "provisions that call for an increase in foreign aid, condemn terrorism and underscore the obligation of states to halt genocide and ethnic cleansing." However, it does not address "proposals to expand the U.N. Security Council, to create an independent auditing board to scrutinize U.N. spending, and to impose basic membership standards for a new Human Rights Council."

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution/AP (9/14, Wadhams) adds, "To reach a consensus, most of the text's details were gutted in favor of abstract language ... Several nations were angry with the way the document was pushed through the General Assembly before it was translated from English into the five other official U.N. languages, a violation of U.N. protocol. That gave ambassadors little time to review it."

The Kansas City Star (9/14, Lederer) adds, "Many countries blame the United States for proposing hundreds of amendments just a few weeks ago to a document they believed was nearing agreement. The major organizations of developing countries, including the Group of 77 and the Nonaligned Movement, then responded with dozens of their own."

Some, Like Bolton, Content; Others, Like Annan, Say Missing Parts Are A "Disgrace.". The Washington Times (9/14, Pisik) adds, "Development specialists praised the outcome of the final declaration, noting that the passages were mostly strong and encouraging ... Jan Eliasson, Sweden's former ambassador to Washington and the president of the General Assembly for the upcoming year, praised the declaration and said it should be assessed compared with historic reform measures, not to recent reform proposals."

The Los Angeles Times (9/14, Farley) adds that diplomats said "there were many more disappointments than successes."

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution/AP (9/14, Wadhams) adds, "The outgoing president of the General Assembly, Gabon's Jean Ping, presented the compromise Tuesday afternoon in hopes of bridging the deepest divides and moving away from bitter line-by-line negotiations that had bogged down the debate ... Though Annan said he was pleased, the document was a significant step backward for him."

The Washington Post (9/14, A6, Lynch, Kessler) adds that Annan said that "members' inability to adopt...measures on disarmament and nonproliferation constituted 'a real disgrace.'"

The New York Times (9/14, Hoge) reports that Secretary General Kofi Annan "complained pointedly...about the elimination in the final version of language covering nuclear nonproliferation and disarmament." John R. Bolton, the American ambassador, said "the United States was satisfied with the outcome, which he said matched the limited hopes he had had for the document."

The Kansas City Star (9/14, Lederer) adds that Germany's U.N. Ambassador Gunter Pleuger said "in hindsight, member states underestimated the amount of preparatory work needed to reach consensus."

America Enters UN Summit With New Internal, External Views. Knight Ridder (9/14, Strobel) reports that as the President heads to the UN summit, the "botched response to Hurricane Katrina has changed views of America both at home and abroad." In other nations there is "incredulity that the world's wealthiest country could fail to take care of its own," while "Americans want more attention on domestic concerns and less on the war on terrorism." Katrina "threw a light on America's class and racial divides," and "public opinion at home and abroad will pose challenges for" the Administration agenda of the "promotion of democracy around the world and the war in Iraq."

Author Says Summit Is On "Brink Of Failure." In an op-ed in the Financial Times (9/14), Nancy Soderberg, vice president for multi-lateral affairs of the International Crisis Group and author of The Superpower Myth: The Use and Misuse of American Might (John Wiley), "The depressing truth is" that the world "failed to take up the secretary-general's challenge. His proposals offer the right way forward for the 21st century but they will have to wait for the world to catch up with his vision. Until then, the world will remain the worse for it." Because of "the ideological clash between the US and much of the developing world," the meeting is on "the brink of failure."

NYTimes Says US Bears "Disproportionate Share" Of Blame For "Squandered" Opportunity. The New York Times (9/14) editorializes, "A once-in-a-generation opportunity to reform and revive the United Nations has been squandered," and "every one of the more than 170 national leaders attending, starting with President Bush, should be embarrassed." However, "the United States, as the host nation and the U.N.'s most indispensable and influential member, bears a disproportionate share" of the blame. President Bush "contended that contrary to all appearances and to common sense, Mr. Bolton was just the man to achieve the reforms the United Nations needed. Almost immediately, Mr. Bolton began proving Mr. Bush wrong," transforming "what had been a painful and difficult search for workable diplomatic compromises into a competitive exercise in political posturing ... By the time Washington retreated to a more realistic position, it was too late to retrieve much of the bold original agenda."

IMF Director Says Fund Needs To Be Redefined. In an op-ed in the Financial Times (9/14) Rodrigo De Rato, managing director of the International Monetary Fund, argues that globalisation "has brought cross-border financial crises and heightened the imperative to bring into the mainstream those who are being left behind ... As we address the challenges of our rapidly globalising world, change is essential if the fund is to remain relevant," and "redefining the fund's mission is inseparable from reassessing IMF governance ... The fund's legitimacy as a global organisation rests on fair representation for all members. The current allocation of quotas...puts this legitimacy at risk in many regions." The fund has collected new mandates "as old mandates remained unchanged" and became "diffuse, resource-intensive operations." Also, "the IMF's work in low income countries is overloaded with procedures that absorb substantial resources yet yield questionable gains. This work must be streamlined to ensure the needs of poverty reduction are met."

Bush May Have "Missed" Taking The Lead On Global Poverty. The New York Times (9/14, Dugger) reports, "Some say" President Bush "has missed an opportunity to take the lead on poverty." The quest to relieve crushing poverty "has been overshadowed by Katrina, the oil-for-food scandal and squabbling over reform of the United Nations itself," while "the administration's opening foray in the negotiations left some African leaders dismayed ... Whatever the verdict on Mr. Bush's role, others are seizing the initiative. Former president Bill Clinton will sponsor a three-day conference in New York beginning tomorrow that will focus on poverty and governing, climate change and conflict."

Clinton's Fight Against Poverty Could Yield "Spectacular" Results. The Financial Times (9/14, Sachs) reports, "The Clinton Global Initiative is surely the most visible of" the efforts against extreme poverty that flank the 2005 World Summit, "drawing upon former President Bill Clinton's ability to mobilize friends from in and out of government and industry. Clinton seems intent on achieving practical actions, following the path set by America's great former President, Jimmy Carter ... If President Clinton takes a page from President Carter's playbook, the results could be spectacular."

Abbas Will Disarm Small Militias Now, Hamas After Elections. USA Today (9/14, Patience) reports, "Mahmoud Abbas said Tuesday that he would impose law and order in Gaza in response to the chaos that followed the pullout of Israeli troops from the territory a day earlier," and "the Palestinian Authority president's chief of staff, Rafiq Husseini, said Abbas would begin disarming small militant groups soon. After parliamentary elections in January, he said, Abbas would insist that big militant groups such as Hamas and Islamic Jihad disarm in accordance with steps in the U.S.-mediated 'road map' to establish a Palestinian state."

Looting, Illegal Board Crossings Continue In Gaza. The New York Times (9/14, Erlanger) reports that thousands "continued their active salvaging of saleable or usable materials from the 21 former Israeli settlements. In some places, Palestinians looted the greenhouses that were bought for their use by American philanthropists, taking nylon tarpaulins, irrigation hoses and electrical equipment," despite the "Palestinian security forces deployed around the greenhouses." Meanwhile, Egyptian "border guards looked the other way as Palestinians crossed the fences into Egypt through the Philadelphi route ... Some Israeli officials criticized the Egyptians and said the lax border controls boded badly for Israel's future security."

Palestine, Israel Disagree Whether Gaza Is Still Occupied. The Washington Times (9/14, Mitnick) reports, "Although Gazans are celebrating a liberation of sorts, the territory isn't a sovereign state, and many Palestinians don't consider Israel's occupation over. Israel, for its part, wants international recognition of the end of its military rule and the beginning of full Palestinian 'jurisdiction' over the Gaza Strip," even though "Israel will retain control of Gaza's airspace, its territorial waters and, for the near future, the border crossing to Egypt." The issue "at stake is whether Israel will be able to fully absolve itself of responsibility for Gaza's anarchy and economic blight, as well as the degree of force that the Jewish state would be able to use in retaliation for cross-border attacks."

While Not Considered Politically Adept, Merkel On Track For Chancellorship. The Washington Post (9/14, A1, Whitlock) reports, "Unsmiling, unstylish and uncharismatic," Angela Merkel "is bidding to become Germany's first female chancellor, as well as the first to have grown up behind the Iron Curtain, in the former East Germany. Polls show that her party, the Christian Democratic Union, holds a lead, albeit a narrowing one." However, "for many Germans she remains a remote figure" and "Merkel's rivals, inside and outside her party, show little regard for her political skills." Still, "in Germany's political system, national leaders are chosen by party, and the Christian Democrats lead the polls."

WPost Says US, Allies Must Continue Pushing Against Darfur Genocide. The Washington Post (9/14) editorializes, "Little by little, American diplomacy has made headway" in stopping the genocide in Darfur. "The progress over the past year demonstrates that the United States and its allies do have the power to save lives by the tens of thousands. It also suggests that, if the Bush administration had pushed harder and earlier, it could have saved many more people." This progress "is incomplete and reversible," and if the United States and its allies "lose interest in Darfur, violence may resume and humanitarian access may dry up."

Protestant Leaders In Northern Ireland Criticized. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (9/14) notes that violence recently "erupted in Northern Ireland...as authorities prevented the Orange Order, the largest Protestant organization in the province, from parading past a Catholic neighborhood." Although "blame for the...violence rests mainly with the leadership of the Orange Order, the silence of at least two key Protestant political leaders who could have helped head off the clashes gives them a share of the responsibility. The Rev. Ian Paisley, head of the Democratic Unionist Party, and Reg Empey, the leader of the Ulster Unionist Party, should immediately denounce sectarian violence as unacceptable." And since forbidding these parades seems to be an unenforceable option, the "only viable solution is to get political leaders to recognize equal rights for both communities, and to get Orange Order leaders to the table, negotiating directly with representatives of the communities through which it intends to march."

Office of Associate Attorney General

Dear Mr. Gorsuch:

I am delighted to learn from JoAnn Bordeaux, that you have agreed to speak at the orientation for the 2005-06 class of AAAS Science & Technology Policy Fellows. Your session is scheduled for Wednesday, September 14, 2005, where you will be joined on the dais by the Honorable Susan Braden of the U.S. Court of Federal Claims. We are requesting that each of you give a 20-minute presentation that highlights the challenges faced by the legal system (in your case, from the perspective of the Justice Department) in dealing with cases that are marked by increasing technical complexity. This would then be followed by open discussion and questions from the audience. The entire session would run from 2:30-3:30 p.m. Enclosed is a preliminary agenda for the full orientation program. Additional information is available on our website, at www.fellowships.aaas.org.

The Fellowship Program was initiated in 1973, and since then more than 1,600 early to mid-career scientists and engineers have been competitively selected from across the United States to spend a year in Washington, D.C., working in Congress and federal agencies on issues relating to science, technology, and policy while learning about the federal policymaking process. The fellowship experience is a stepping stone to leadership positions, whether the Fellows remain in government, return to academia, or pursue careers in the non-profit or private sectors.

Although a highly sophisticated group, the new AAAS Fellows have varying degrees of familiarity with the policy process when they arrive in Washington. The orientation plays a critical role in their preparation for the fellowship year. Previous orientations have featured a wide range of speakers, including Members of Congress Sherwood Boehlert, Jeff Bingaman, Rush Holt, and John D. Rockefeller IV; journalists Cory Dean of The New York Times, Joe Palca of NPR, and Rick Weiss of The Washington Post; Nobel Peace Prize Laureate and former President of Costa Rica, Oscar Arias; Valdas Adamkus, President of Lithuania; the Ambassadors of Bulgaria, Switzerland and Sweden; and Bruce Alberts, immediate past President of the National Academy of Sciences.

We will be hosting a luncheon with Rep. Ros-Lehtinen just prior to your session, at the Columbus Club at Union Station. We plan to convene your session there as well. We would pleased, if your schedule permits, for you to join the Fellows and other guests at the luncheon. Please let me know if you are able to attend. For both the luncheon and sessions to follow, we expect the audience to number around 150 people, including new and former Fellows and AAAS staff.

We are honored to have you join us as a AAAS orientation speaker along with some of the other distinguished individuals we have invited to participate, including Secretary of State Condolezza Rice, Brazilian Ambassador to the U.S. Roberto Abdenur, and Scientific Advisor to President Bush, Dr. John Marburger.

In the weeks ahead, you will be contacted by Chris McPhaul, Associate Director of the Fellowship Program, to answer your questions and to provide the necessary logistical information associated with organizing the session. In the interim, should you have any questions, I can be reached by phone at 202.326.6793 and via email at mfrankel@aaas.org.

Sincerely,

RE: St. Louis Family Justice Center Grand Opening and ARCHS

Neil,

First, a note to say I enjoyed meeting and talking with you, during the St. Louis Family Justice Center's grand opening. We at ARCHS are quite proud of our role in the FJS's realization and in its long term sustainability.

Secondly, to put more meat on our conversation, attached find a detailed info packet highlighting who ARCHS is and what ARCHS does on behalf of Metro St. Louis and the State of Missouri.

- On the packet's left side, you'll find all there is to know about ARCHS.
- On the packet's right side, you'll find info on our Workforce Development Department, specifically Workforce programming for soon to be or recently released parolees.
  In fact ARCHS and U.S. Probation Office, Eastern District of Missouri, our primary partner in federal parolee workforce programming, are anxiously awaiting final funding approval from the U. S. Department of Labor for a multiyear comprehensive program called " St. Louis CARES" (fact sheet enclosed).

Lastly, should your return trips to St. Louis allow time, I extend an open invitation to you to come visit ARCHS and allow my team to show you how we "Build Great Partnerships for the Greater Good of Greater St. Louis.

Cordially,

Wendell E. Kimbrough

Building Great Partnerships

St. Louis Cares Re-Entry Partnership Fact Sheet

Facing the highest unemployment rate in Missouri (11.2%) and a host of barriers (educational issues, lack of skills, transportation, and childcare), ex-offenders returning to Greater St. Louis must negotiate major challenges as they seek to establish a new, productive life.

To assist them, the St. Louis Community Action Re-entry Employment System (St. Louis CARES) has designed a systems model featuring a holistic approach building upon the considerable resources of local community- and faith-based organizations in the St. Louis region. Our multi-year program will serve more than 600 ex-offenders from ages 14 through adult in the first year alone. Our goal is to place 75% of them in unsubsidized jobs or paid apprenticeship programs.

The mission of St. Louis Cares is to strengthen the Greater St. Louis region through an employment-centered re-entry program that will incorporate case management, mentoring, job training, job placement, registered apprenticeship programs, micro-enterprise development and job creation. This initiative draws together four critical social sectors to implement this program model: the justice community, community partners, the faith community, and business community.

Data collected by the Offender Employment Program implemented in the Eastern District of Missouri reveals an inverse correlation between employment and recidivism. In short, employment is the key to successfully reintegrating prisoners into society. The following risk and protective factors (ranked in order of their correlation to re-incarceration) are addressed in this program model: Employment, Substance Abuse, Mental Illness, Family and Social Support, Education. Housing, Transportation, Attitudes and Cognitive Skills.

Program components will be delivered by convening diverse segments of the St. Louis region. Faith-based organizations will provide mentors, supportive services and referrals; local job-readiness organizations and businesses will provide soft skills and hard skills training, job placement and retention services; businesses and local governments will be engaged as partners to address the need for transitional jobs and job creation; and criminal justice and corrections agencies will identify and refer participants to the program. A myriad of career tracks will be offered.

The work of these organizations will be aggregated in an employability plan and an individual life plan for each ex-offender who is in pre-release or post-release stages or has completed a probationary period. Especially important is the Follow-Up and Retention stage, which features 30-, 60-, 90-, and 180-day follow-up and case management, moderated by Faith-Based Retention Teams and guided by career assessment and continued education.

ARCHS- Area Resources for Community and Human Services and the U.S. Probation Office-Eastern Missouri -convened the community partners to create St. Louis Cares. As Missouri's Community Partnership for Greater St. Louis, ARCHS will provide St. Louis Cares with objective assessment, fiscal management and outcomes measurement expertise. The three-year, $20.5 million St. Louis Cares Partnership proposal is pending final funding approval by the U.S. Department of Labor. (Winter 06)

Subject: Fw: This Tuesday: Briefing on Pandemic Influenza Modeling and Impact of Interventions

In support of ongoing pandemic influenza planning efforts, we have asked the authors of recent Science and Nature papers on the subject to provide a presentation on their pandemic models and projections of the impact of various interventions on the spread of a pandemic virus. Both papers are attached.

The presentation will take place this Tuesday, Nov. 15 from 2:00-4:00 PM in EEOB Rm. 450. Departments and agencies are invited to send two representatives to the briefing. Clearance information should be provided to Sharon Wells by 3:00 PM on Monday (swells@who.eop.gov)

This work is supported by the NIH/MIDAS program, has been performed in the U.S. and U.K. and was presented at HHS last week. Further information on the MIDAS program can be found here: http://www.nigms.nih.gov/Initiatives/MIDAS/compartmentalization of components within the cell, and with temporal profiles of activation, to obtain a more comprehensive picture of the functional organization of a cell. Still, distance in chemical space (i.e., number of links between two distal nodes) is likely to be a major determinant of information processing that regulates phenotypic behavior.

The maps for individual ligands or cellular machines show distinct patterns of motifs. Combinations of ligands will likely produce many more patterns of connectivity. Thus, a cellular system may not be a single network but rather an ensemble of network configurations that are evoked by the stimuli-induced activation of various parts of the system. Identifying these network configurations and the functions they evoke is likely to provide more complete descriptions of how molecular interactions lead to cellular choices between homeostasis and plasticity.

Containing Pandemic Influenza at the Source

Ira M. Longini Jr.,[1]* Azhar Nizam,[1] Shufu Xu,[1] Kumnuan Ungchusak,[2] Wanna Hanshaoworakul,[2] Derek A. T. Cummings,[3] M. Elizabeth Halloran[1]

Highly pathogenic avian influenza A (subtype H5N1) is threatening to cause a human pandemic of potentially devastating proportions. We used a stochastic influenza simulation model for rural Southeast Asia to investigate the effectiveness of targeted antiviral prophylaxis, quarantine, and pre-vaccination in containing an emerging influenza strain at the source. If the basic reproductive number (R_0) was below 1.60, our simulations showed that a prepared response with targeted antivirals would have a high probability of containing the disease. In that case, an antiviral agent stockpile on the order of 100,000 to 1 million courses for treatment and prophylaxis would be sufficient. If pre-vaccination occurred, then targeted antiviral prophylaxis could be effective for containing strains with an R_0 as high as 2.1. Combinations of targeted antiviral prophylaxis, pre-vaccination, and quarantine could contain strains with an R_0 as high as 2.4.

The world may be on the brink of an influenza pandemic (1–4). Avian influenza A (subtype H5N1) is causing widespread outbreaks among poultry in Southeast (SE) Asia, with sporadic transmission from birds to humans (5) and limited probable human-to-human transmission (6). Should an avian virus reassort with a human virus, such as influenza A subtype H3N2, within a dually infected human host or reassort in a nonhuman mammalian species, or if mutation of the virus occurs, the resulting new variant could be capable of sustained human-to-human transmission. The outbreak among humans would then spread worldwide via the global transportation network more rapidly than adequate supplies of vaccine matched to the new variant could be manufactured and distributed (1, 7). The pressing public health questions are whether and how we can contain the spread of an emerging strain at the source or at least slow the initial spread to give time for vaccine development. We used a discrete-time stochastic simulation model of influenza spread within a structured geographically distributed population of 500,000 people in SE Asia to compare the effectiveness of various intervention strategies against a new strain of influenza. Here we examine the effectiveness of the targeted use of influenza antiviral agents (8–12), quarantine, and pre-vaccination with a poorly matched, low-efficacy vaccine in containing the spread of the disease at the source.

We used information about rural SE Asia (13, 14) to construct the model population. Our goal was to represent the contact connectivity of a typical rural SE Asian population. The model population of 500,000 people was distributed across a space of 5625 km^2, yielding a density of 89/km^2, which is approximately the population density of rural SE Asia (13). The 500,000 people were partitioned into 36 geographic localities. This model is an extension of a model used to simulate interventions against pandemic influenza in the United States (12).

The model [see the supporting online material (SOM) for details] represents the number of close and casual contacts that a typical person makes in the course of a day. The age and household size distributions of the population are based on the Thai 2000 census (13). Many of the mixing group sizes and distributions are based on a social network study of the Nang Rong District in rural Thailand (14). We constructed the social network for contacts sufficient to transmit influenza as a large set of connected mixing groups. The close contact groups consist of households, household clusters, preschool groups, schools, and workplaces; and the casual contact groups consist of other social settings (such as markets, shops, and temples) and a single regional 40-bed hospital. All people can mix in their households and within clusters of households, whereas children mix in preschool groups or schools according to their age and the probability that they are still in school. Children are assigned to schools across the geographic space according to the Nang Rong study. Adults mix in workplaces according to a distance function that distributes them across the geographic space informed by the Nang Rong study and national migration statistics (15, 16). One concern for containment is that infected people might leave the modeled 500,000-person rural area. We estimate that the daily probability that a person will leave (escape) the area is on the order of 10^{-3} (15). The population structure and the resulting social network graphs and statistics are given in the SOM.

The natural history of influenza (Fig. 1A) has been relatively invariant over the past two pandemics and during the interpandemic period since 1968 (12, 17–20). Calibration of the model requires information about both the relative and absolute magnitudes of the age-specific illness attack rates. Because of uncertainty about the relative age-specific illness attack rates for a future influenza pandemic in SE Asia, we calibrated the epidemic to a pattern that falls between two extremes. At one extreme, children would have a much higher illness attack rate than adults, the pattern observed during the 1957–1958 A (subtype H2N2) Asian influenza pandemic in the United States (17, 21, 22). At the other extreme, all age groups would have roughly the same illness attack rates, the pattern observed during the 1968–1969 A (H3N2) Hong Kong influenza pandemic in the United States (17, 22–24). The pattern for interpandemic influenza in SE Asia appears to be more like the A (H2N2) pattern (25). We used the pattern shown in Fig. 1B.

The magnitude of the illness attack rates will depend on the unknown transmissibility of the new strain. The overall illness attack rate for the past Asian and Hong Kong pandemics was about 33% in the first wave. We calibrated the model with a target overall illness attack rate of 33%, corresponding to a basic reproductive number (R_0) (the average number of secondary infections caused by a single typical infectious individual in a completely susceptible population) of 1.4 (see the SOM). By varying the per-contact probability of infection in the model, we alter the R_0. Figure 1B shows the age-specific attack rates at R_0 values ranging from 1.1 to 2.4. For calibration to historical attack rates, influenza was introduced by randomly assigning 12 initial infectives. We simulated the emergence of a new influenza strain by introducing a single randomly assigned infective.

Intervention is triggered by the first case (that is, symptomatic infection), with a delay of 7, 14, or 21 days to implementation. This delay can be interpreted as a delay in recognition of illness, a delay in implementation of intervention, initiation of transmission by more than one initial infection, or a combination of these three factors. A sensitivity analysis considers delays up to 56 days (fig. S14). Once intervention begins, intervention in additional localities is implemented 1 day after the first case in the affected locality.

Targeted antiviral prophylaxis (TAP) is carried out by treating identified index cases (the first symptomatic illness in a mixing group) and offering prophylaxis only to the contacts of these index cases in predefined close contact groups (12); namely, households, neighborhood clusters, preschool groups, schools, and workplaces. Index cases are therapeutically treated the day after the onset of illness, and prophylaxis of contacts begins at the same time, both being given a single course of oseltamivir. A susceptible individual may receive subsequent courses if exposed to further index cases. We assume that a certain percent, varied in a sensitivity analysis, of household (preschool) index cases could be ascertained and that all their other household (preschool) members would receive prophylaxis (fig. S11). For index cases in a school or workplace, only

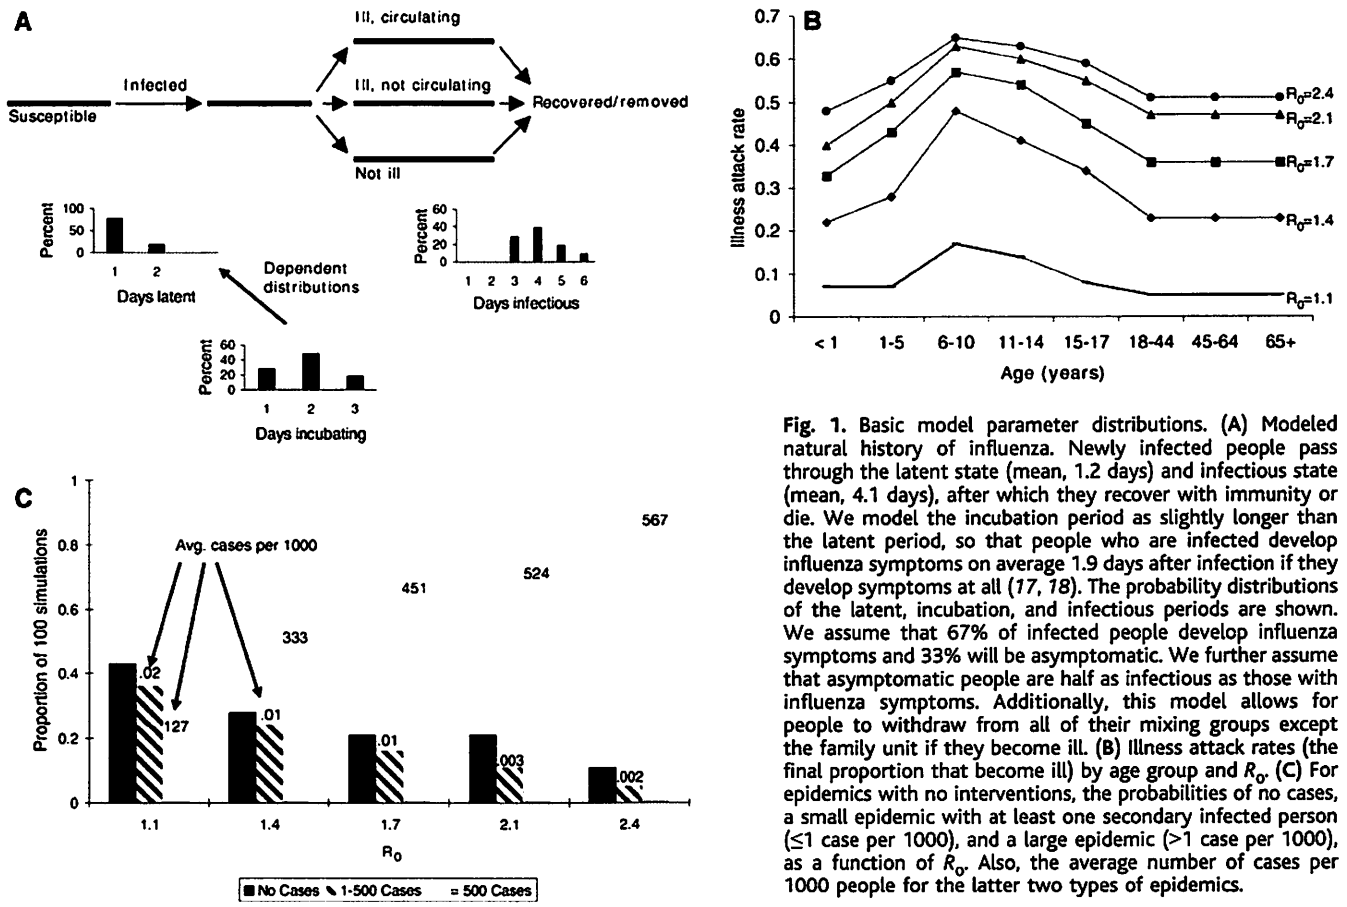

Fig. 1. Basic model parameter distributions. (A) Modeled natural history of influenza. Newly infected people pass through the latent state (mean, 1.2 days) and infectious state (mean, 4.1 days), after which they recover with immunity or die. We model the incubation period as slightly longer than the latent period, so that people who are infected develop influenza symptoms on average 1.9 days after infection if they develop symptoms at all (17, 18). The probability distributions of the latent, incubation, and infectious periods are shown. We assume that 67% of infected people develop influenza symptoms and 33% will be asymptomatic. We further assume that asymptomatic people are half as infectious as those with influenza symptoms. Additionally, this model allows for people to withdraw from all of their mixing groups except the family unit if they become ill. (B) Illness attack rates (the final proportion that become ill) by age group and R_0. (C) For epidemics with no interventions, the probabilities of no cases, a small epidemic with at least one secondary infected person (≤1 case per 1000), and a large epidemic (>1 case per 1000), as a function of R_0. Also, the average number of cases per 1000 people for the latter two types of epidemics.

a certain percent of the people in that mixing group would receive prophylaxis. We used current estimates of the antiviral efficacy (AVE) of oseltamivir (26–29) (see the SOM).

The primary difficulty in TAP would be the identification of index cases. Because TAP is aimed at predefined close contact groups, the identification of potential TAP recipients would be less difficult than in classical contact tracing. An alternative and less resource-intensive strategy would be geographically targeted antiviral prophylaxis (GTAP), also known as ring prophylaxis. In this strategy, once an influenza case is identified in a locality, then a percentage, varied in a sensitivity analysis (fig. S12), of people in an entire locality are given one course of oseltamivir.

Household quarantine, like GTAP, is implemented within localities. The first case in a locality triggers a quarantine policy. Every case and a certain percentage of susceptible people restrict their movement to within their household and their neighborhood cluster. Because quarantined people would have more contact with their household and neighborhood contacts, the contact probabilities within households and household clusters are doubled for quarantined people.

A human influenza A (H5N1) vaccine is currently being tested (7) and may be available, but could be poorly matched to the emerging strain and thus be of low efficacy. For the model scenarios that use vaccination, we assume that pre-vaccination takes place long enough before the pandemic that vaccinated people can develop immunity. We assume a low vaccine efficacy for susceptibility (VE_S) (30) of 0.30 and a vaccine efficacy for infectiousness (VE_I) of 0.50. We carried out a sensitivity analysis on VE_I (fig. S19).

We consider an epidemic to be contained if there are fewer than 500 cases in the 500,000-person community (≤1 per 1000). The containment proportion is the proportion of simulations in which the attack rate is ≤1 per 1000. Another measure of how well we have contained the epidemic is the number of infected people who travel out of the 500,000-person community over the course of the epidemic. If this number is very low or even zero, we have effectively contained spread at the source. The number of cases per 1000 people in the population is another measure of success of the intervention.

Given an initial person infected with the newly emergent influenza strain, there are three possible outcomes: (i) no further people are infected; (ii) there is a small epidemic, between 1 and 500 total cases (≤1 per 1000); or (iii) there is a large epidemic (>1 case per 1000 people). The relative probabilities of these three outcomes as well as the average size of a large epidemic vary with R_0 (Fig. 1C).

Figure 2A shows a typical realization of a large epidemic due to a single initial infective at $R_0 = 1.4$, with no intervention, as well as the average times for intervention initiation. On average, the first symptomatic case appeared 4 days after the initial infection, with intervention initiation times on average 11, 18, or 25 days after the initial infection. Figure 2B shows a typical realization of an epidemic contained with 90% GTAP. Movies 1 to 3 in the SOM show the geographic spread of the epidemic with and without intervention.

Figure 3 gives bar plots of the results for the different intervention strategies and values of R_0. Table 1 gives numbers for the results for R_0 values of 1.4 and 1.7. The measures of containment did not vary much if intervention was initiated 7, 14, or 21 days after the first case, so we give results just for the 14-day delay, followed by a sensitivity analysis of the effect of further delay (fig. S14). When $R_0 = 1.1$, just above threshold, all of the interventions work well. Both 80% TAP and 90% GTAP would be effective in containing pandemic influenza at the source if $R_0 \leq 1.4$. If $R_0 \geq 1.7$, then neither 80% TAP nor 90% GTAP is consistently effective in containing the epidemic, and 300,000 to 350,000 courses of oseltamivir would be needed. Thus, for these interventions singly, a containment threshold exists somewhere between $R_0 = 1.4$ and 1.7. Further sensitivity analysis shows that the containment threshold is roughly at $R_0 = 1.6$.

Also shown are the main intervention initiation times considered and the number of cases at those intervention times. Fig. 3. The effectiveness of the different interventions as compared to no intervention started 14 days after the first case at different values of R_0. The interventions considered are 90% GTAP, 80% TAP, 80% TAP plus 50% pre-vaccination of the population (80% TAP 50% Pre-Vac), 80% TAP plus 70% pre-vaccination of the population (80% TAP 70% Pre-Vac), 70% household and household cluster quarantine (70% Quar), 80% TAP with 70% household and household cluster quarantine (80% TAP 70% Quar), and 80% TAP plus 50% pre-vaccination of the population with 70% household and household cluster quarantine (80% TAP 50% Pre-Vac 70% Quar). (A) Average number of cases per 1000 people with no intervention and with different interventions. (B) Average containment proportion defined as the proportion of epidemics with one or more secondary cases that had 500 or fewer cases in the population of 500,000 (or ≤1 case per 1000). The "no intervention" entry gives the proportion of these epidemics that had 500 or fewer cases with no intervention in the population of 500,000 (or ≤1 case per 1000). (C) Average number of infected people leaving the 500,000-person population. Each day, the number of infected people who have not withdrawn to the home or are quarantined is multiplied by 10^{-3}, the probability that a person will travel outside of the 500,000-person area. (D) Average number of courses of oseltamivir used for the intervention.

Pre-vaccination of the population with a low-efficacy vaccine greatly enhances the effectiveness of TAP and GTAP, even with just 50% coverage. With pre-vaccination, both 80% TAP and 90% GTAP are effective at containing the epidemic when $R_0 = 1.7$, but not at higher levels of R_0. Pre-vaccination essentially lowers the reproductive number (31). Local household quarantine is effective at containing the epidemic if $R_0 \leq 2.1$ but is not as effective at $R_0 = 2.4$. However, a combination of 80% TAP plus quarantine is effective at an R_0 as high as 2.4, and adding pre-vaccination makes TAP plus quarantine even more effective.

We conducted a number of sensitivity analyses of the effectiveness of the different interventions at different levels of implementation and delay (figs. S11 to S18). We found that at $R_0 \leq 1.4$, either TAP or GTAP alone is effective only at the 70% level or higher. At higher values of R_0, household quarantine must reach the 70% level to be effective. In terms of timing of the intervention (fig. S14), 90% GTAP and 80% TAP become less effective when the intervention starts 28 days or more after the detection of the first symptomatic case, when there is an average of 85 cases already. Quarantine at the 70% level becomes less effective 42 days (average, 313 cases) after detection of the first case, even with the addition of TAP. All other interventions in combination with pre-vaccination would be fairly effective even 56 days (average, 894 cases) after the detection of the first case.

It may not be practical to get antiviral agents to exposed people within 1 day of the index case developing symptoms. We carried out a sensitivity analysis for delays in initiation of TAP in the close contact mixing groups ranging from 2 to 5 days after detection of an index case, with 80% TAP. With a delay of up to 2 days, substantial reduction in the number of cases is still achieved, but with delays of 3 to 5 days, there is less benefit (fig. S15). Sensitivity analysis on antiviral efficacy (figs. S16 to S18) shows that the effectiveness of TAP and GTAP is moderately sensitive to variation in AVE_S but not as much to variation in antiviral efficacy in preventing symptomatic disease if infected, AVE_D. Both AVE_S and AVE_I need to be 0.5 or higher for either TAP or GTAP to be effective. Sensitivity analysis on VE_I shows that the effectiveness of 80% TAP with 70% pre-vaccination is sensitive to variation in VE_I (fig. S19). However, even at a level of VE_I as low as 0.1 (fig. S19), the epidemic is still well contained.

We have shown that the targeted use of antiviral agents, if implemented within 21 days of the first case and if $R_0 \leq 1.4$, would have a high probability of success for containing an emergent influenza strain at the source in a rural SE Asian population. Such interventions would be effective for R_0 values as high as 1.7 in the presence of pre-vaccination with a low-efficacy vaccine. For higher values of R_0, localized household quarantine would have to be implemented, possibly in combination with targeted antiviral prophylaxis to contain the pandemic at the source. Although the R_0 of a future newly emergent influenza strain is unknown, previous estimates are 1.89 from the first epidemic of pandemic A (H3N2) in Hong Kong (19) and 2 to 3 for 1918 pandemic A (H1N1) in the United States (32). However, a newly emergent influenza strain may not yet be well adapted to humans and could have an $R_0 < 2$, and possibly just above 1. As the virus adapts to human-to-human transmission, there would probably be an incremental increase in R_0 with each transmission event (33). This makes early intervention especially important.

Based on the results here, the current World Health Organization stockpile of 120,000 treatment courses could possibly be sufficient to contain a pandemic if the stockpile were deployed at the source of the emerging strain within 2 to 3 weeks of detection. Given that early containment at the original source may fail or the emergent strain may appear simultaneously in several locations, up to 1 million courses could be needed to deal with the multiple outbreak foci. In addition, pre-vaccination of populations at risk for a newly emergent influenza strain would be prudent, even if the vaccine provided only moderate protection. Although the effectiveness of most interventions was fairly invariant to the timing of intervention initiation up to 21 days after the first case, delay much beyond that could allow the pandemic to spread unless pre-vaccination takes place.

These results are probabilistic and demonstrate considerable variability in the potential size of the epidemic in the absence of and in response to intervention (34). Public health officials need to keep this probabilistic characteristic of success in mind when planning and evaluating their response. We have developed a flexible mathematical model that can help determine the best intervention strategies for containing pandemic influenza at the source. Should a newly emergent influenza strain appear, the model could be quickly calibrated to data and intervention options at the source of the epidemic. Data should be provided from the field to estimate the value of R_0; the serial interval between cases; the distributions of the latent, incubation, and infectious periods; pathogenicity; case fatality ratios; and secondary spread within important mixing groups.

Drugs, Quarantine Might Stop A Pandemic Before It Starts

Thirty-six years after the last influenza pandemic, researchers wonder whether they can make these global disasters a thing of the past

It might just work. With military-style planning, a big stash of pills, and a lot of luck, the world might be able to stop a nascent influenza pandemic dead in its tracks, two new modeling studies conclude.

The models, published online this week in Nature and Science (www.sciencemag.org/cgi/content/abstract/1115717), are the first attempts to estimate the power of the antiviral drug oseltamivir to quash a pandemic—an unprecedented and audacious idea. If large numbers of people in the region first hit by a pandemic virus take the drug prophylactically and comply with some quite draconian measures to limit their movements and contacts, millions of lives might be saved, the authors of both papers say—and medical history would be rewritten in the process.

But just how likely is that scenario to succeed? As experts point out, the models, both of which chose Thailand as the presumptive ground zero, are based on several untested assumptions: that the runaway virus isn't highly infectious, for instance, and that large quantities of drugs can be distributed rapidly to the right people, even in remote villages. "The models make sense, and we should seriously consider this approach," says Harvard epidemiologist Marc Lipsitch, "but the take-home message is there's no way we can count on this."

The researchers—one team led by Ira Longini of Emory University in Atlanta, Georgia, the other by Neil Ferguson of Imperial College London—hope their work will lead to concrete actions because until now, there's been little if any official commitment to such a plan. The World Health Organization (WHO), which the researchers say would have to lead the effort, is "interested," says the agency's pandemic chief, Margaret Chan. Rich countries are stockpiling oseltamivir to protect their own populations, but they have no plans yet for shipping it to the cradle of a pandemic. Nor are the Asian countries affected by H5N1—the avian influenza strain most feared as the potential source of the next pandemic—on board or necessarily up to the logistics, although they were slated to discuss the idea at a meeting in Bangkok earlier this week.

Drug of the day. A global stockpile of up to 3 million treatment courses of oseltamivir might be needed.

Given influenza's history, most experts peg the chance that the world will be hit by another pandemic at 100%. The question is when it will occur and how bad it will be; there's widespread agreement that the death toll could be in the tens of millions. Vaccines offer by far the best chance to avert that danger—at least in countries that can afford them—but these would take months to produce after a pandemic begins (Science, 15 October 2004, p. 394).

A bold new idea is to use oseltamivir to battle a potentially pandemic virus at the source, before it becomes a global threat, using an internationally run stockpile. The strategy might be the only way to prevent disaster in the majority of countries unable to afford vaccines or drugs at all, notes Arnold Monto of the University of Michigan, Ann Arbor. Oseltamivir would make those who get the flu less infectious to others, but by far its most important task would be to prevent infection in those exposed to the virus.

Now, that idea has been put to the test. Longini and his colleagues simulated an imaginary population of 500,000 people who live, work, and move about in rural Southeast Asia. Meanwhile, Ferguson and his colleagues built a model based on the 85 million people living in Thailand and a 100-kilometer-wide border zone in neighboring countries. Both then introduced a pandemic virus and looked at how well different containment strategies performed.

The cornerstone in each model was giving a 10-day prophylactic course of oseltamivir to the contacts of every suspected flu patient—either by treating everyone in their household, school, or workplace, or by simply giving it to anyone living within a certain radius. In both models, the drug regimens were supplemented by measures such as closing schools, "home quarantine," or "area quarantine," in which travel into and out of the hot zone is restricted.

And in both models, the more such measures were deployed, the higher the chances were that the pandemic petered out, with thousands or even millions of people taking an oseltamivir course, but only a few hundred actual flu cases. But success depended critically on a few factors.

One is the infectiousness of the pandemic virus. Epidemiologists characterize infectious agents by a factor called R_0, which denotes the number of secondary infections caused by a primary case. In both studies, viruses with an R_0 between 1.0 and 1.8 could usually be contained, depending on the exact set of measures; with an R_0 well above 2.0, the outbreak often spiraled out of control. Estimates for R_0 during past pandemics have varied; in a paper published in December, Lipsitch concluded that it was between 2 and 4 in the United States during the 1918–19 pandemic. But Ferguson estimates it was about 1.8.

Stop right there. A computer model shows how a new pandemic might spread in Thailand. With massive prophylaxis, the outbreak might end after just a few hundred cases.

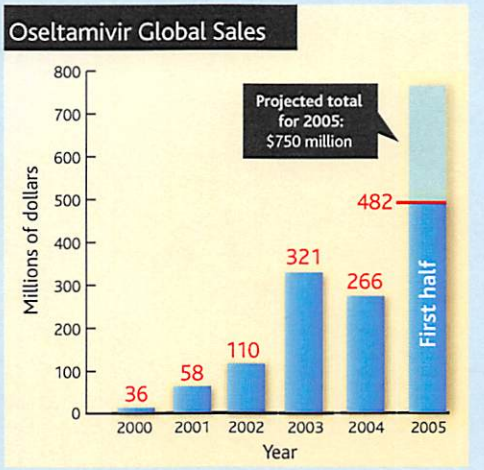
A Drug Makes It Big—But Can It Deliver?

The worldwide fears triggered by the Asian outbreak of H5N1 have created one clear winner: oseltamivir, the drug that, from a quartet of candidates, is considered the best one to fight a pandemic. More than two dozen governments have placed orders for a stockpile with the producer, Roche in Switzerland; 2005 sales are expected to exceed $700 million—up from just $110 million 3 years ago—and seem poised to grow further, says Bret Holley, an analyst at CIBC World Markets in New York City.



The procurement orders may be lucrative, but it remains to be seen just how effective oseltamivir, known commercially as Tamiflu, will be during an influenza pandemic. Nor is there agreement about how big a national stockpile should be, or who should receive the drugs to maximize their impact. And in the worst-case scenario, resistance in the flu virus might render stockpiles worthless.

As a remedy against nonpandemic flu, oseltamivir has certainly failed to win many supporters since its launch in 1999. The drug, which blocks a viral enzyme called neuraminidase, can make a bout with influenza more bearable and shorten the duration of symptoms by a day or more; it has also been shown to prevent complications and hospitalizations—but not mortality. The problem is that it needs to be given within 48 hours of infection to be fully effective. And even for patients who meet that deadline, most doctors don't think the benefits warrant the $65 cost of a prescription. (Japan, where sales have soared, is the exception.)

How well oseltamivir will perform against human infection with H5N1 is unclear. It has shown anti-H5N1 activity in test-tube and animal studies, but human cases have been so rare that experience is extremely limited.

Who should get treatment is also in question. Pandemics may sicken between 25% and 50% of the population in 3 months, but many people with milder cases can probably recover by themselves. Still, countries such as France, the United Kingdom, and Finland are amassing enough oseltamivir to treat 20% to 30% of their populations; the United States, on the other hand, currently has only 2.3 million doses for almost 300 million people. The Bush Administration was expected to announce a new order shortly—although nowhere near the 67 million to 124 million treatments that the Infectious Diseases Society of America has urged.

Recently, another potential role of oseltamivir has garnered a great deal of attention: that of preventing illness rather than treating it. Studies have shown that oseltamivir can reduce the risk of infection in people exposed to the virus by around 80%. That benefit is key in global plans to stamp out a pandemic early on (see main text); once a virus is on its worldwide rampage, national governments could similarly attempt to slow its spread within their own borders.

Last year, a study by Ira Longini's team at Emory University in Atlanta, Georgia, showed that using oseltamivir preventively could contain an outbreak in the United States, and a paper published this month by Ran Balicer of Ben Gurion University of the Negev in Be'er Sheva, Israel, suggests that stockpiling drugs for this purpose should be cost-effective if pandemics occur more often than once every 80 years. That may seem like a fairly safe bet, but it would require reserves for much more than 25% of the population—an amount few countries are considering at the moment.

For now, a more feasible and widely discussed approach may be to restrict prophylactic use to certain groups, such as health care workers, people performing "essential" jobs, or the elderly—although picking the beneficiaries might create wrenching ethical dilemmas.

Another worry is that once tens of millions of people start taking Tamiflu, the virus will become resistant. So far, resistance appears to be rare in other flu strains; during the 2003–04 flu season, when a whopping 6 million treatment courses were prescribed in Japan, only 4 of 1180 virus isolates tested there showed resistance, a group reported in April. And fortunately, mutations that confer resistance also appear to slow the virus's growth.

Tamiflu may soon face some competition, as other drugs are in the pipeline. And many researchers say they'd feel a lot better if the bullish market for flu drugs were split between a couple of rivals. –M.E.

Another key condition in both models is that the operation starts within a couple of weeks of the first cases. Chances of containment drop dramatically if it takes more than 2 days to reach new patients' contacts. Both conditions may be challenges, to say the least, in rural areas with poor health care.

Some infectious-disease experts put little stock in models like these. "In 30 years in public health, I've never seen any statistical modeling that had any impact on public health. And this is no exception," says Michael Osterholm, director of the Center for Infectious Disease Research and Policy at the University of Minnesota, Twin Cities. A single SARS patient in a Hong Kong hotel triggered a worldwide outbreak in 2003, he notes; no model could have predicted that turn of events.

But to Anthony Fauci, director of the U.S. National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases, the studies provide an "interesting blueprint" of what might be possible. "Even if there's only a 20% or 30% chance of success, it's worthy of the effort," adds Frederick Hayden, an antiviral expert at the University of Virginia, Charlottesville, "given the enormous impact that a pandemic would have."

It wouldn't be all that expensive, Hayden notes. The amount of oseltamivir needed—some 3 million courses in Ferguson's most unfavorable scenario—isn't very much; the United Kingdom alone has ordered almost 15 million 5-day courses for its own citizens. WHO already has more than 100,000 treatment courses, donated by Roche, sitting in a stockpile. And Roche may soon make another, much larger donation to WHO, says David Reddy, the company's influenza pandemic task force leader.

But although WHO welcomes any oseltamivir it can get its hands on, more studies, as well as discussions with the affected countries, are needed to find out whether the snuffing-out scenario is feasible, Chan says. The Thai government, for its part, is interested in exploring the option, says Supamit Chunsuttiwat, a senior expert for communicable diseases at the Ministry of Public Health. The two papers, he says, "give us some hope that we might be able to do this."

But Osterholm worries that the two papers might calm fears prematurely. Even if the scheme envisioned by Ferguson and Longini were successful once, he said, it would need to be repeated as long as H5N1 is rampant in the bird population. Longini agrees. But who knows, he says, researchers might get better at it after the first time. And in any case, only a small region would be affected in every budding pandemic. "It's not like we're exposing the entire world to a fire drill every time," Longini says.

Strategies for containing an emerging influenza pandemic in Southeast Asia

Neil M. Ferguson[1,2], Derek A.T. Cummings[3], Simon Cauchemez[4], Christophe Fraser[1], Steven Riley[5], Aronrag Meeyai[1], Sopon Iamsirithaworn[6] & Donald S. Burke[3]

Highly pathogenic H5N1 influenza A viruses are now endemic in avian populations in Southeast Asia, and human cases continue to accumulate. Although currently incapable of sustained human-to-human transmission, H5N1 represents a serious pandemic threat owing to the risk of a mutation or reassortment generating a virus with increased transmissibility. Identifying public health interventions that might be able to halt a pandemic in its earliest stages is therefore a priority. Here we use a simulation model of influenza transmission in Southeast Asia to evaluate the potential effectiveness of targeted mass prophylactic use of antiviral drugs as a containment strategy. Other interventions aimed at reducing population contact rates are also examined as reinforcements to an antiviral-based containment policy. We show that elimination of a nascent pandemic may be feasible using a combination of geographically targeted prophylaxis and social distancing measures, if the basic reproduction number of the new virus is below 1.8. We predict that a stockpile of 3 million courses of antiviral drugs should be sufficient for elimination. Policy effectiveness depends critically on how quickly clinical cases are diagnosed and the speed with which antiviral drugs can be distributed.

The continuing spread of H5N1 highly pathogenic avian influenza in wild and domestic poultry in Southeast Asia represents the most serious human pandemic influenza risk for decades[1,2]. Great potential benefits would be gained from any intervention able to contain the spread of a pandemic strain and eliminate it from the human population. However, the rapid rate of spread of influenza—as witnessed both in annual epidemics and past pandemics[3–5]—poses a significant challenge to the design of a realistic control strategy.

The basic reproduction number[6], R_0, quantifies the transmissibility of any pathogen, which is defined as the average number of secondary cases generated by a typical primary case in an entirely susceptible population. A disease can spread if $R_0 > 1$, but if $R_0 < 1$, chains of transmission will inevitably die out. Hence, the goal of control policies is to reduce R_0 to below 1 by eliminating a proportion $1 - 1/R_0$ of transmission. This can be achieved in three ways: (1) by reducing contact rates in the population (through 'social distance measures'), (2) by reducing the infectiousness of infected individuals (through treatment or isolation), or (3) by reducing the susceptibility of uninfected individuals (by vaccination or antiviral prophylaxis).

Vaccination and antiviral drugs offer protection against infection and clinical disease. However, although effective vaccines exist for interpandemic flu, candidate H5N1 vaccines have unproven effectiveness[7], and production delays would in any case limit availability in the first months of a pandemic. Antiviral agents—particularly the neuraminidase inhibitors, which show experimental effectiveness against all influenza A subtypes[8,9]—are therefore a key aspect of recently revised pandemic preparedness plans in several countries[10].

For antivirals to significantly reduce transmission, prophylactic use is necessary. Large-scale prophylaxis has the potential to limit spread substantially in a developed country[11], but the very large stocks of drug necessary make this policy impractical if the pandemic is already global. However, might such a policy nonetheless be a feasible strategy if applied at the source of a new pandemic, when repeated human-to-human transmission is first observed? Here we address this question, and focus on identifying the threshold level of transmissibility below which containment of any new pandemic strain might be feasible.

Modelling pandemic spread

We modelled pandemic spread in Southeast Asia, as this region remains the focus of the ongoing avian H5N1 epidemic and is where most human cases have occurred. Data availability led us to model Thailand rather than any perceived greater risk of emergence compared to other countries in the region; however, we believe our conclusions are also valid for other parts of Southeast Asia.

We constructed a spatially explicit simulation of the 85 million people residing in Thailand and in a 100-km wide zone of contiguous neighbouring countries. The model explicitly incorporates households, schools and workplaces, as these are known to be the primary contexts of influenza transmission[12–14] (see Fig. 1 and Methods) and because control measures can readily target these locations. Random contacts in the community associated with day-to-day movement and travel were also modelled.

Natural history and transmission parameters

Fundamental to the feasibility of any containment strategy is being able to quantify the transmissibility of the emergent virus, R_0. Reliable past estimates of transmissibility are rare, perhaps owing to the antigenic diversity of influenza and the consequent complex effect of population immunity on transmission.

We re-analysed incubation period and household transmission data for human influenza (see Methods) and derived new natural history parameters, which predict a profile of infectiousness over time that is remarkably consistent with viral shedding data from experimental infection studies (see Fig. 1g and ref. 15). This profile gives an estimate of the serial interval or generation time, T_g (the average interval from infection of one individual to when their contacts are infected), of 2.6 days, compared with the value of ~4 days assumed by most previous modelling studies[16]. Re-analysis of both US and UK 1918 pandemic mortality data using this new value of T_g revises pandemic influenza R_0 estimates[5] downwards to approximately 1.8 (Fig. 1f and Supplementary Information). This yields a predicted infection attack rate of 50–60% during a pandemic, consistent with what was seen in the first and second waves of past pandemics (see Supplementary Information). An R_0 value of 1.8 is also consistent with annual interpandemic attack rates seen in households where all members were highly susceptible to the prevalent strain[17] (see Supplementary Information). We also assumed that 50% of infections result in clinically recognizable symptoms, with the other 50% being too mild to be diagnosed clinically[18].

We cannot be certain that these parameter estimates would be applicable to any new pandemic strain. It is possible that the mutations or reassortment events that give rise to the new viral strain might initially increase its transmissibility only slightly over the $R_0 = 1$ threshold for self-sustaining transmission. In that case, additional mutations would have to accumulate for viral fitness to increase to its maximum. Given the extended viral shedding (and symptomatic disease) seen in severe human cases of avian H5N1 infection, this might also mean that the T_g of the initial pandemic strain could be considerably greater than for currently circulating human influenza viruses. We therefore examine the ability of control measures to contain pandemic spread not just at a single value of R_0, but for different values in the range $1 < R_0 < 2$, and analyse model sensitivity to the assumed value of T_g.

Baseline epidemic dynamics

We consider the scenario that a new transmissible ($R_0 > 1$) pandemic strain arises as a result of mutations or a reassortment event in a single individual infected with an avian virus. We seed simulations with a single infection in the most rural third of the population (that is, with the lowest population density), assuming that rural populations are most likely to be exposed to the avian virus. Figure 2 shows the typical pattern of spread for an emergent pandemic initiated by such a seeding event assuming $R_0 = 1.5$, but note that for low R_0, most epidemics seeded by a single individual go extinct by chance before becoming established in the population.

The pattern of spatial spread (Fig. 2a and Supplementary Video 1) is of interest: for the first 30 days, cases tend to be limited to the region around the seeding location, with few 'sparks' outside that area. However, as case numbers increase exponentially, so does the frequency with which infection events span large distances, and the epidemic rapidly transforms from being predominantly local to country-wide between days 60 and 90 (Fig. 2a–c). Any containment policy needs to be effective before this transition, in part because logistical constraints are likely to preclude containment of a widely disseminated epidemic, but also because the probability of international export of infection becomes high once case numbers reach the thousands (Hollingsworth, D., N. M. F. & Anderson, R. M., unpublished observations).

For $R_0 = 1.5$, the epidemic in the modelled population of 85 million peaks around day 150 and is largely over by day 200 (Fig. 2b), at which point 33% of the population has been infected (Fig. 2d). At $R_0 = 1.8$, the epidemic peaks around day 100 and infects about 50% of the population.

Effect of antiviral prophylaxis

In evaluating containment strategies, we focus on two principal outcome measures: (1) the probability of preventing a large outbreak (which would eventually lead to a global pandemic), and (2) the number of courses of drug (assumed here to be oseltamivir) required to achieve containment.

Blanket prophylaxis of an entire country or region should be able to eliminate a pandemic virus with an R_0 of 3.6 or greater (see Methods). However, such a policy would require enough drug to prophylax everyone for up to three weeks (that is, at least two courses per person) and is hence unfeasible. Targeted strategies are therefore needed to minimize drug usage while maximizing effect.

Social targeting is the most straightforward approach. This involves prophylaxing individuals in the same household, school or workplace as a newly diagnosed symptomatic case. Unfortunately, if such a policy is only initiated after 20 or more cases, purely social targeting only has a ≥90% probability of eliminating the pandemic strain if $R_0 \leq 1.25$ (lowest curve of Fig. 3a; see also Supplementary Information). In reality, at least ten cases might have to be detected to be sure that viral transmissibility had significantly increased[19], and detection and decision-making delays could easily mean 20–30 cases had arisen before policy initiation. A containment policy will therefore probably have to go beyond social targeting in order to succeed. As most community contacts are local, geographic targeting—namely, prophylaxing the whole population in the neighbourhood of the household in which a case is detected—is an obvious policy extension, but one that will no doubt greatly increase the logistical challenges to delivery. In the absence of detailed administrative boundary data, we simulated geographic targeting as the prophylaxis of the population within a ring of a certain radius centred around each detected case, but in practice targeting administrative areas is likely to be more practical. For social or geographic prophylaxis, we assume that individuals are given a single course of ten days of drug, after which time they come off the drug unless more cases have arisen in their vicinity, in which case a second round of prophylaxis is delivered. The policies therefore cease automatically within ten days of the last case being reported.

Our analysis indicates that the additional effort required to deliver a geographic policy pays substantial dividends in terms of policy effectiveness. With a two-day delay from case onset to prophylaxis, a 5-km ring policy is able to contain pandemics with an R_0 of 1.5 (Fig. 3a) at the cost of an average of 2 million courses (Fig. 3b), but the maximum number of courses needed can increase by an (unfeasible) order of magnitude for scenarios in which cases arise in Bangkok at an early stage of the outbreak. Policy effectiveness increases with the radius of the treatment ring selected (but little benefit is gained from exceeding 10 km), as does the number of courses required (Fig. 3b). Policy outcome is still sensitive to the speed of case detection and drug delivery, but containment is always substantially better than for the purely socially targeted policy (Fig. 3d).

As pure radial prophylaxis is costly in terms of drug, we also examined a policy variant that limits the number of people targeted for prophylaxis per case by only targeting the nearest m people (where m = 10,000–50,000) within 10 km of a newly diagnosed case. In areas of low population density, this drug-sparing policy has the same effect as a pure 10-km ring policy, but in high-density areas many fewer courses of drug are used. The improved effectiveness in rural areas outweighs decreased effectiveness in urban areas, resulting in a greater effect than a pure 5-km ring policy and much lower drug use (Fig. 3e, f).

Epidemiologically, elimination occurs either because the treatment strategy reduces R_0 to below 1, or because it reduces R_0 to close to 1 when the epidemic is small, thereby enhancing the probability of random extinction. For scenarios in which the pandemic strain is successfully eliminated, geographic spread is usually limited. For example, the root mean square (r.m.s.) radius of spread is 27 km for $R_0 = 1.5$ using the 5-km radial geographic targeting strategy. When containment is successful, total case numbers are also limited to an average of fewer than 150 cases.

Policies to increase social distance

Measures to increase social distance have been used in past pandemics and remain important options for responding to future pandemics[1]. However, predicting the effect of policies such as closing schools and workplaces is difficult, as potentially infectious contacts may be displaced into other settings. Furthermore, it is likely that population contact rates change spontaneously (as well as a result of policy) during severe epidemics (for example, 1918) in response to the perceived risk. Therefore, the estimates of pandemic transmissibility we derive from past pandemics might implicitly incorporate the effects of some degree of social distancing.

We are therefore deliberately conservative in the assumptions made here regarding the effect of school and workplace closure, by assuming that household and random contact rates increase by 100% and 50%, respectively, for individuals no longer able to attend school or work. Figure 4a illustrates how adding area-based school and workplace closure to a drug-sparing prophylaxis policy increases policy effectiveness significantly, with the combined policy having a >90% chance of elimination for $R_0 = 1.7$.

Quarantine zones, in which movements in and out of the affected area are restricted, are another strategy for enhancing containment, and may in any case be thought necessary to prevent population flight from affected areas or deliberate entrance of people into prophylaxis zones to receive drug. Figure 4a (see also Supplementary Video 2) shows that such an area quarantine strategy can greatly increase the effectiveness (to 90% containment at $R_0 = 1.8$) of radial geographic targeted prophylaxis even if only 80% effective at reducing movements. Combining school and workplace closure with area quarantine and prophylaxis further increases policy effectiveness (90% containment at $R_0 = 1.9$), and equally importantly, increases the robustness of the policy to shortcomings in case identification or treatment rates. For all these policies, containment is typically achieved after fewer then 200 cases have been detected.

Logistical constraints and sensitivity to parameter assumptions

Other constraints may affect the ability of public health authorities to deliver containment policies. Figure 4c shows that the size of an antiviral stockpile can have a substantial effect on policies that use pure radial geographic prophylaxis, as very large numbers of courses are required to prophylax populations around cases arising in large urban areas. However, policies using drug-sparing, geographically targeted prophylaxis (Fig. 4d) retain high effectiveness provided that at least 3 million drug courses are available. For scenarios in which containment fails with a finite stockpile, Fig. 4e shows that even an unsuccessful containment strategy can delay widescale spread by a month or more—a potentially critical window of opportunity for accelerating vaccine production.

Another possible constraint is that capacity to implement these containment policies might not be present in all countries in the region. A policy restricted to one country alone might have a substantially reduced chance of success (Fig. 4f and Supplementary Video 3) should the initial case cluster arise in a border region.

Multiple assumptions are inevitably made when undertaking preparedness modelling for a future emergent infection. Sensitivity analyses are therefore critical for assessing the robustness of policy conclusions. Here, critical assumptions not already discussed include (1) the ratio of within-place to community transmission, (2) the expected generation time, T_g, of a new pandemic strain (largely determined by the duration of viral shedding and therefore infectiousness), (3) the level of heterogeneity in individual infectiousness (for example, 'superspreaders'[20]), (4) antiviral efficacy/take-up, and (5) the sensitivity and specificity of case detection during the control programme. The effect of these assumptions on model output is presented in the Supplementary Information. In summary, points (4) and (5) are the most critical, as one might expect. If antiviral coverage or efficacy is considerably less than assumed, then policy effectiveness is substantially reduced. Similarly, if surveillance picks up fewer than 40% of infections (that is, 80% of symptomatic cases), policy effectiveness is again reduced. Poor surveillance specificity (that is, false positives) has an indirect effect on effectiveness as a result of wasted drug and logistical capacity.

Conclusions

We have shown that containment and elimination of an emergent pandemic strain of influenza at the point of origin is feasible using a combination of antiviral prophylaxis and social distance measures. A key conclusion is the need for multiple approaches: simple socially targeted prophylaxis is unlikely to be sufficient if the emergent virus has transmissibility levels near those of previous pandemic viruses. Geographically targeted policies are needed to achieve high levels of containment, with area quarantine being particularly effective at boosting policy effectiveness. The only scenario under which purely socially targeted strategies might be sufficient would be if viral transmissibility evolved incrementally and the emergent virus initially had an R_0 only slightly above 1 (see Supplementary Information); however, R_0 will be probably be uncertain at the time at which containment policies have to be implemented, arguing for precautionary policies that assume transmissibility comparable with that of past pandemics.

A number of key criteria must be met for a high probability of success: (1) rapid identification of the original case cluster, (2) rapid, sensitive case detection and delivery of treatment to targeted groups, preferably within 48 h of a case arising, (3) effective delivery of treatment to a high proportion of the targeted population, preferably >90%, (4) sufficient stockpiles of drug, preferably 3 million or more courses of oseltamivir, (5) population cooperation with the containment strategy and, in particular, any social distance measures introduced, (6) international cooperation in policy development, epidemic surveillance and control strategy implementation. Containment is unlikely if R_0 exceeds 1.8 for the new pandemic strain. Although our analysis of past pandemics suggests that transmissibility will fall below this threshold, it is unlikely that sufficient data will exist to verify this before a containment policy has to be introduced.

The mathematical model we have used to examine the feasibility of pandemic containment is perhaps the largest-scale detailed epidemic micro-simulation yet developed. A key goal of the modelling was parsimony. Although the representation of the population is detailed, this detail is underpinned by available demographic data. The natural history parameters used here have been estimated from primary data on existing influenza strains. The model has five key transmission parameters, of which two were estimated from household data and the remaining three were qualitatively calibrated to historical age-dependent attack rates. We believe that this type of simulation will increasingly become a standard tool for preparedness planning and modelling of new disease outbreaks.

Given the set of criteria listed above for successful containment, the obstacles to practical implementation of such a strategy are undoubtedly formidable. Surveillance is perhaps the single greatest challenge. Success depends on early identification of the first cluster of cases caused by the pandemic strain[19], and on detection of a high proportion of ongoing cases. Some level of mildly symptomatic infection is to be expected (and has been observed for human H5N1 infections[21]), but key to successful containment is the proportion of such cases and their infectiousness. Should the high pathogenicity of recently reported human infections with the H5N1 virus be even partly maintained, then containment might paradoxically be more likely, as case-ascertainment levels would be higher.

Achieving the rapid delivery of antiviral drugs to a large proportion of the population raises many challenges. Thailand, the country modelled here, is one of the best-prepared and equipped countries in the region in terms of being able to implement a large-scale and very rapid public health intervention. Other countries need considerable development in basic healthcare and disease surveillance infrastructure in order to meet the needs of containment.

Antiviral resistance represents a currently unquantifiable challenge to a prophylaxis-based containment strategy. The key will not be whether genotypic or clinical resistance is seen in a percentage of individuals, but whether resistant viruses are capable of self-sustaining transmission (that is, have $R_0 > 1$). Current evidence indicates that fitness deficits in oseltamivir-resistant strains mean that their transmissibility is limited[22,23], but we cannot rule out the possibility that compensatory mutations that increase transmissibility might be selected. If a transmissible resistant strain did emerge during implementation of a containment policy, it would be essential for prophylaxis to cease, lest the wild-type virus be eliminated and the world be left with a pandemic of resistant virus. If prophylaxis were abandoned, the likely higher fitness of the wild-type virus would give every chance for the resistant strain to become excluded from the population.

A feasible strategy for containment of the next influenza pandemic offers the potential to prevent millions of deaths. It is therefore in the interest of all countries to contribute to ensuring that resources, infrastructure and collaborative relationships are in place within the region most likely to be the source of a new pandemic. The challenges are great, but the costs of failure are potentially so catastrophic that it is imperative for the international community to prepare now, to ensure that containment is given the best possible chance of success.

METHODS

Demographic data. The model used Landscan data[24] to generate a simulated population realistically distributed across geographic space (Fig. 1a). Thai census data[25,26] on household size and age distributions were used for demographic parameterization (Fig. 1b, c). Data from the Thai National Statistical Office[26] were used to determine the number and proportions of children in school as a function of age, and data from the Thai Department of Education on 24,000 schools (available from the authors upon request) were used to determine the distribution of school sizes (Fig. 1d). Data on travel distances within Thailand were limited; here we used data collected in the 1994 National Migration Survey[27,28] on distances travelled to work (Fig. 1e and Supplementary Information) to estimate movement kernel parameters. The best-fit kernel had asymptotic power-law form as a function of distance d given by $f(d) \sim 1/[1+(d/a)^b]$, where $a = 4$ km and $b = 3.8$. Thai workplace sizes[29] also follow a power-law distribution[30], with an estimated maximum single workplace size of approximately 2,300 and a mean of 21 individuals.

Disease data. The natural history of any H5-based pandemic strain will not be known until it emerges, so we used parameter estimates for current human influenza subtypes, and used sensitivity analyses to investigate what effect deviation from these estimates would have on policy effectiveness (see Supplementary Information). The mean ± s.d. of the incubation period distribution was estimated as 1.48 ± 0.47 days, on the basis of data from a multiple-exposure event occurring on an aeroplane[31].

We adopt a more biologically realistic approach than most previous modelling studies (but see ref. 32), and rather than assuming that infectiousness is constant from the end of the latent period until recovery, we model it as a function, $\kappa(T)$ (assumed normalized), depending on the time elapsed from the end of the latent period. The generation time, T_g, is given by the mean latent period plus $\int_0^\infty T\kappa(T)\mathrm{d}T$. Experimental infection data[33] indicate the start of symptoms to be coincident with a sharp increase in viral shedding, so we assume that infectiousness starts at the end of the incubation period. We further assume a 0.25-day delay from when symptoms start to when diagnosis or healthcare-seeking behaviour is likely. We used bayesian methods (see Supplementary Information) to estimate $\kappa(T)$ from data collected in a recent household study of respiratory disease incidence[34,35]. Combined with the estimated incubation period distribution, this gives the profile of infectiousness shown in Fig. 1g.

T_g is estimated as 2.6 days (95% credible interval: 2.1–3.0), which is shorter than previously assumed (but see ref. 36).

Transmission model. The model is a stochastic, spatially structured, individual-based discrete time simulation. Individuals are co-located in households, with households being constructed to reflect typical generational structure while matching empirical distributions of age structure and household size for Thailand (Fig. 1b, c). Households are randomly distributed in the modelled geographic region, with a local density determined by the Landscan data[24]. In any time-step of $\Delta T = 0.25$ days, a susceptible individual i has probability $1 - \exp(-\lambda_i \Delta T)$ of being infected, where λ_i is the instantaneous infection risk for individual i. Infection risk comes from 3 sources: (1) household, (2) place, and (3) random contacts in the community. The last of these depends on distance, representing random contacts associated with movements and travel, and is the only means by which infection can cross national borders. Analysis of household infection data (see Supplementary Information), gave a within-household R_0 of 0.6 and an overall R_0 of 1.8. We partition non-household transmission to give levels of within-place transmission comparable with household transmission (that is, $R_0 \approx 0.6$) and to qualitatively match 1957 influenza pandemic age-specific attack rates. When varying R_0, the relative proportions of household, place and community transmission were kept fixed. Full model details are given in the Supplementary Information.

Antiviral drug action. We use recent statistically rigorous estimates of antiviral efficacy[37], but these are broadly consistent with previous estimates[22]. Prophylaxis of uninfected individuals is assumed to reduce susceptibility to infection by 30%, reduce infectiousness if infection occurs by 60%, and reduce the probability of clinically recognizable symptoms by 65% (ref. 37). In theory, blanket prophylaxis of a population should be able to contain a pandemic with an R_0 of $1/[(1 - 0.6)(1 - 0.3)]$, or approximately 3.6. Treatment of a symptomatic case is assumed to reduce infectiousness by 60% from when treatment is initiated. Overall, for the parameter values used here, antiviral treatment of a symptomatic case can reduce total infectiousness throughout the course of infection by a maximum of 28%.

EXAMINER ROUNDTABLE:
Discussion Summary

Roundtable Conducted
October 18, 2004, in Washington, DC

SUMMARY

Examiner Roundtable Discussion
Monday, October 18, 2004
Executive Office for U.S. Trustees
20 Massachusetts Avenue, NW
8th Floor Main Conference Room
Washington, DC 20530

Preface:

When the Enron and WorldCom corporations and related entities filed for chapter 11 bankruptcy protection within seven months of each other in 2001 and 2002, they were the largest bankruptcy cases in history. From the outset, there were allegations of massive accounting fraud and great uncertainty as to how far that fraud extended into the companies. In both cases, the U.S. Trustee believed that the appointment of an examiner to provide an exhaustive and independent review of the matters leading up to the insolvency was of critical importance to creditors, shareholders, and the public interest. In announcing court action to appoint an independent examiner, Attorney General Ashcroft said that "[t]he appointment will help protect . . . creditors and shareholders by bringing transparency to these cases and ensuring that issues of possible mismanagement and civil fraud are thoroughly investigated."

A number of issues relating to the appointment of the examiner and the conduct of the examination process arose during the Enron and WorldCom cases. There were divergent opinions as to the scope of the examiner's duties. There were also competing interests from different parties, including the debtors, their creditors, and various government agencies. Finally, the timing, content, and use of the reports raised issues.

The purpose of the Roundtable was to review selected issues that arose in the cases and to identify lessons learned that may inform future practices and procedures. There were five major topics of discussion at the meeting: the appointment and selection of an examiner; terms of appointment orders; the coordination of investigations with law enforcement and regulatory authorities; the examiner's interim and final reports; and the disclosure of information by the examiner outside of the reports.

The Roundtable discussion took place during a single five hour meeting. Former Attorney General Dick Thornburgh and Neal Batson, the examiners in WorldCom and Enron, respectively, were the lead participants.

This report was prepared by the Executive Office for U.S. Trustees (EOUST) which is solely responsible for its content.

Discussion Summary:

Appointment and Selection of an Examiner

The appointment of an examiner is not typical in a bankruptcy case. The Bankruptcy Code sets forth the basic standards for appointment and selection. Timing of an appointment, consultation with interested parties, and the efficiency of the selection process were discussed.

Roundtable Participants

Representatives of:
- WorldCom Examiner
- Enron Examiner
- Securities and Exchange Commission
- Department of Justice:
  - Office of the Deputy Attorney General
  - Criminal Division
  - Tax Division
  - United States Attorneys
  - United States Trustees

The appointments of the Enron and WorldCom examiners occurred at different times in the cases – the examiner in WorldCom was appointed soon after the filing, and the Enron examiner was appointed approximately six months into the case. Participants suggested that, in general, an earlier appointment is preferable to a later one, although there can be benefits to each. Early appointment may lessen statute of limitations problems in pursuing claims, increase the likelihood of greater witness recollection, insure the preservation of evidence, and provide an opportunity for greater communication and a more structured delineation of duties/priorities between investigating entities. Later appointment, however, may eliminate duplicative efforts by allowing the examiner to use information obtained from other investigations, and may reduce or eliminate concerns regarding the disclosure of information that could compromise law enforcement investigations.

In considering examiner candidates, the U.S. Trustee has a duty to consult with parties in interest. After a determination is made as to the needs of the case, candidates are considered and vetted through an initial conflicts process. This review eliminates many candidates, particularly in large cases. Once the list is refined, consultation with parties in interest is again undertaken.

Conflicts are a significant concern because bankruptcy cases generally involve a large number of stakeholders with diverse interests. One of the major challenges to the conflicts process is having adequate time to conduct a thorough review given the constraints imposed by the court and the urgency of the matters. It was the perception of many that law firms are refining their systems for vetting conflicts. Participants agreed that it is critical that the United States Trustee and the candidates have timely and sufficient information about the case and the role the examiner will fulfill. Beyond traditional conflicts analysis, complex cases also require careful consideration of issue conflicts that may impact a candidate's ability to carry out an independent investigation.

In the aftermath of Enron and WorldCom, the EOUST established a formal protocol regarding the appointment of examiners in publicly-held companies to provide for consultation with the SEC and law enforcement. It was also pointed out that the President's Corporate Fraud Task Force plays an important role in coordinating federal regulatory and criminal enforcement responses to corporate wrong-doing. Finally, to enhance the speed with which examiners and trustees may be appointed in large cases, the EOUST maintains a list of capable candidates who have indicated an interest in serving in the future.

Terms of Appointment Orders

The Enron and WorldCom cases presented unprecedented challenges in determining the terms of appointment orders due to the multiplicity of investigations. Issues discussed included the scope of the engagements; the division of duties; and restrictions on public statements.

The scope of the examinations in the Enron and WorldCom cases was quite different. Enron was focused on a discrete area, whereas WorldCom had a broad mandate. While a broad mandate provides greater latitude, it also requires judgment and focus by the examiner. Striking the appropriate balance is the challenge.

A discussion of the division of labor among all involved (e.g., the examiner, creditors' committee, investigators) at an early stage is critical. To the extent feasible, it was suggested that delineating specific points of demarcation between the various entities could be helpful.

The examiners felt that it was advantageous for the order of appointment to provide preempting civil investigatory authority, which could then be shared if appropriate. However, the participants noted that the sharing of information should be considered carefully in light of the typical confidentiality provisions in orders requiring the production of information to the examiners and the potential for a criminal defendant to take the position that the examiner is somehow a "de facto" agent of the Department of Justice.

There was a consensus that a prohibition against public statements by the examiner on a case, at least until interim or final reports are filed with the court, is appropriate. It allows the examination to continue without undue distraction.

Coordination of Investigations with Law Enforcement and Regulatory Authorities

At the time of the filing of both the Enron and WorldCom cases, investigations had already been commenced – both by the companies internally and by law enforcement and regulatory agencies. While the purpose of the examiners, as characterized by the courts, was to provide an independent review and neutral evaluation of the cases, the various investigations overlapped to the extent that they led to the same witnesses, documents, and other evidence.

Though it was noted that multiple investigations offer the ability to share information, they also present problems with regard to competing interests. The examiner's role to "tell the story" may get ahead of and adversely affect prosecutions, particularly with the issuance of interim reports.

There was discussion that the development of work plans and regular communication are critical to avoiding conflicts. Having someone on the examiner's staff who is experienced in working with the Department of Justice on criminal matters was recommended, and it was noted that the EOUST was a key player in facilitating dialogue among the parties and negotiating issues of concern.

Smaller reports on specific or targeted issues may be a practical solution to concerns of an examiner's published findings affecting an investigation. Sequencing could satisfy public expectations, yet avoid the problem of an examiner "opening the door too fast" and adversely affecting an investigation. It could also simultaneously address the issue of expiring statute of limitations on discovered causes of action. Finally, limiting the issues may encourage greater witness participation because there is less fear of investigatory disclosure than if questioning is broad or open ended.

An additional point that was raised was the need for prosecutors and regulators to have sufficient time to preview reports and address any material that may compromise ongoing investigations. In both Enron and WorlCom, this time was limited due to the reporting requirements established by the court.

Examiner's Interim and Final Reports

This discussion focused on the purpose of the reports; the potential impact on the bankruptcy estate (e.g., claims); and the value of the reports to debtors, creditors, the court, law enforcement, regulatory agencies, and the public.

It was noted that critical to a successful inquiry were the elements that were built into the appointment order (i.e., subpoena power, party-in-interest standing, requirement of debtor to cooperate and provide information, and waiver of the attorney-client privilege). However, all problems could not be foreseen. For example, in Enron, the examiner confronted

5th Amendment issues when he attempted to interview witnesses facing possible indictment for their role in the creation of Special Purpose Entities. Furthermore, particularly in WorldCom, reporting deadlines created significant challenges, although it was recognized that timely disclosure of the examiner's findings promoted public confidence in the bankruptcy proceedings.

A discussion was held relating to the role of the examiner in investigating potential claims held by or against the estate and the specific extent to which these claims should be reported by the examiner. Creditors believe these should be addressed by the appointed committees. Representatives of the debtor objected to the identification of claims against the estate, where those claims did not specifically deal with fraud or misrepresentation. The examiners viewed their duties as being duties to the court and not to any particular economic constituency. In the Enron case, Judge Gonzalez concurred with this position. These issues need to be anticipated early in the examination because they may shape its length and cost.

From a law enforcement perspective, it was believed that the examiners' reports were helpful and added value to the process. It was noted, however, that in large part that was because there were two highly qualified examiners with a solid understanding of criminal enforcement matters and a willingness to cooperate. If an examiner is not sensitive to law enforcement concerns, there could be significant issues and it could become necessary to seek court restrictions to avoid impeding criminal investigations.

Irrespective of what the reorganized debtors may do with the examiners' reports, it was generally thought that the goals the court envisioned were achieved. Further, the reports appear to have an extended value in that there has been considerable interest by scholars and universities in the examiners' reports and findings.

Disclosure of Information by the Examiners Outside of Reports

Some practical issues have arisen as a result of an examiner having considerable information gathered in a relatively short period of time and available in one location. Historically, the courts have been protective of examiners to inquiries by private parties since they are a fiduciary of the court. Conversely, though, when law enforcement or prosecutors have sought information, the courts have been split on when a protective order trumps a request by law enforcement.

It was suggested that the inclusion of language in the order of appointment precluding discovery from the examiner may promote a greater willingness for law enforcement to share information with the examiner since it would shield against private civil discovery at a later date. If not addressed up front, another option may be to address disclosure issues in the order terminating the services of the examiner.

A concern for the examiner is that he/she does not want to become the "document depository," particularly since there are issues of attorney-client privilege and the need for appropriate court approval on disclosure. A possible remedy may be to build into the closing order language on the debtor's privilege not extending to the examiner's access to documents or testimony.

It was the consensus that while there may be efficiency to an examiner having the authority to prosecute or object to claims, it is ultimately the debtor's or the appointing court's decision as to how to proceed.

Conclusion:

The examiners in Enron and WorldCom successfully carried out their mission and produced final reports that were of value to creditors, law enforcement agencies, and the public. Participants in the Roundtable identified a series of difficult issues that arose in these cases and that may be expected to arise in other complex chapter 11 cases involving allegations of wrong-doing. There was consensus that some of these issues can be identified early in the case and should be addressed by provisions in the order to appoint an examiner. Among the most important matters to be resolved early are: delineating the duties of the examiner from the activities of other parties; expressly providing that the examiner's investigation has primacy over the work of other non-government agencies; and limiting disclosure of the examiner's work product during and after the investigation to protect the integrity of the investigation and maximize the amount of information that the examiner will be able to obtain during the investigation.

Executive Summary

On November 17, 2003, Attorney General John Ashcroft announced the U.S. Department of Justice's Body Armor Safety Initiative in response to concerns from the law enforcement community regarding the effectiveness of body armor in use. These concerns followed the failure of a relatively new Zylon®-based[1] body armor vest worn by a Forest Hills, Pennsylvania, police officer. The Attorney General directed the National Institute of Justice (NIJ) to initiate an examination of Zylon®-based bullet-resistant armor (both new and used), to analyze upgrade kits provided by manufacturers to retrofit Zylon®-based bullet-resistant armors, and to review the existing program by which bullet-resistant armor is tested to determine if the process needs modification.

As part of the Body Armor Safety Initiative, NIJ has issued two status reports to the Attorney General containing results from the body armor studies.[2] The first two status reports highlighted the following findings:

- Ballistic-resistant material, including Zylon®, can degrade due to environmental factors, thus reducing the ballistic resistance safety margin that manufacturers build into their armor designs.
- The ultimate tensile strength[3] of single yarns removed from the rear panel of the Forest Hills armor was up to 30-percent lower than that of yarns from "new" armor supplied by the manufacturer. Artificially-aged armor of the same type that failed in the Forest Hills incident was ballistically tested, but no bullet penetrations occurred.[4]
- The upgrade kits tested did not appear to bring used armor up to the level of performance of new armor. However, used armors with upgrade kits performed better than the used armors alone.

NIJ has now completed ballistic and mechanical properties testing on 103 used Zylon®-containing body armors provided by law enforcement agencies across the United States. Sixty of these used armors (58%) were penetrated by at least one round during a six-shot test series. Of the armors that were not penetrated, 91% had backface deformations in excess of that allowed by the NIJ standard for new armor. Only four of the used Zylon®-containing armors met all performance criteria expected under the NIJ standard for new body armor compliance.

Although these results do not conclusively prove that all Zylon®-containing body armor models have performance problems, the results clearly show that used Zylon®-containing body armor may not provide the intended level of ballistic resistance. In addition, the results imply that a visual inspection of body armor and its ballistic panels does not indicate whether a particular piece of Zylon®-containing body armor has maintained its ballistic performance.

[3] Ultimate tensile strength is the maximum stress (force per unit area) that a material, in this case a Zylon® yarn, can withstand prior to failure. All Zylon® yarns were nominally 500 denier; i.e., the yarns did not vary in linear density or effective cross-sectional area.

Part of the Body Armor Safety Initiative entailed an applied research component that examined material properties of Zylon® in order to understand the causes of the ballistic failures. Zylon® fibers show a systematic loss in tensile strength, tensile strain, and ballistic performance correlated with the breakage of specific bonds in the chemical structure of the material.

Preliminary findings from the applied research effort indicate that:

- It is likely that the ballistic performance degradation in Zylon®-containing armors is closely related to the chemical changes in poly-p-phenylene benzobisoxazole (PBO), the chemical basis of Zylon® fiber. The breakage of one particular part of the PBO molecule, known as the oxazole ring, correlates with degradation of the mechanical properties of Zylon® fibers. The breakage in the oxazole ring can be monitored using an analysis technique known as Fourier transform infrared (FTIR) spectroscopy.
- Preliminary investigations into Zylon® degradation mechanisms have suggested that oxazole-ring breakage occurs as a result of exposure to both moisture and light.
- When there was no potential for external moisture to contact Zylon® yarns, there was no significant change in the tensile strength of these yarns. External moisture may be necessary to facilitate the degradation of Zylon® fibers.

Based on the direction from the Attorney General and recommendations from the law enforcement community, NIJ has examined its body armor compliance testing program. The current NIJ testing program is based on the ballistic resistance of new armor and does not take into account performance degradation in used armor. NIJ is concerned that Zylon® and other materials may be incorporated into body armor, with minimal understanding of performance degradation that may result from environmental exposures. NIJ's research indicates that its testing program should take into account the possibility of ballistic performance degradation over time.

NIJ intends to adopt interim changes to its body armor compliance testing program, to aid in ensuring that officers are protected by body armor that maintains its ballistic performance during its entire warranty period. These actions are set forth in detail in Section VI of this report. Under the NIJ 2005 Interim Requirements for Bullet-Resistant Body Armor, armor models containing PBO (the chemical basis of Zylon®) will not be compliant, unless their manufacturers can provide satisfactory evidence to NIJ that the models will maintain their ballistic performance over their declared warranty period.

All manufacturers will be required to submit information concerning materials used in the construction of any armor submitted for testing.

NIJ will recommend that those who purchase new bullet-resistant body armor select body armor models that comply with the NIJ 2005 Interim Requirements for Bullet-Resistant Body Armor. A list of models that comply with the requirements will be made available at http://www.justnet.org.

NIJ will also encourage manufacturers to adopt a quality-management system to ensure the consistent construction and performance of NIJ-compliant armor over its warranty period. In the future, NIJ will issue advisories to the field regarding materials used in the construction of body armor that appear to create a risk of death or serious injury as a result of degraded ballistic performance. Any body armor model that contains any material listed in such an advisory will be deemed no longer NIJ-compliant unless and until the manufacturer satisfies NIJ that the model will maintain its ballistic performance over its declared warranty period. NIJ will continue its research and evaluation program to determine what additional modifications to the requirements of NIJ's compliance testing program may be appropriate, to understand better the degradation mechanisms affecting existing or new ballistic materials, and to develop test methods for the ongoing performance of body armor.

NIJ continues to encourage public safety officers to wear their Zylon® - containing armor until it can be replaced. Even armor that may have degraded ballistic performance is better than no armor.

NIJ 2005 Interim Requirements for Bullet-Resistant Body Armor

Effective Date
August 24, 2005

Purpose and Scope
These requirements modify and supplement National Institute of Justice (NIJ) Standard 0101.04 (Ballistic Resistance of Personal Body Armor). They are promulgated on an interim basis to address recent NIJ research findings that indicate that certain body armor models previously found by NIJ to be compliant with earlier NIJ requirements for ballistic resistance of new body armor (including NIJ Standard 0101.04) may not adequately maintain ballistic performance during their service life. In keeping with their interim character, these requirements rely in significant part on specific certifications from manufacturers of body armor. To help ensure the accuracy of the certifications, NIJ intends to implement a plan to conduct random or other assessments of the certifications and the evidence that underlies them. Also, in furtherance of these efforts, from time to time, NIJ may issue Body Armor Standard Advisory Notices, among other things to identify to the public body armor materials that, based on NIJ review, appear to create a risk of death or serious injury as a result of degraded ballistic performance. Such Advisory Notices will be made available at: https://vests.ojp.gov/index.jsp.

NIJ recommends that those who purchase new bullet-resistant body armor after the effective date hereof select body armor models that comply with these interim requirements. A list of models that comply with these requirements will be made available at: http://www.justnet.org. NIJ will no longer publish lists of models found by NIJ (prior to the effective date hereof) to be compliant with earlier NIJ requirements for ballistic resistance of new body armor (including NIJ Standard 0101.04).

NIJ's efforts to ensure the safety of public safety officers are ongoing; NIJ intends to promulgate future modifications to these interim requirements as appropriate in light of its continued research and comments from the law enforcement and manufacturing communities. Comments and suggestions should be directed to the Director, Office of Science and Technology, National Institute of Justice, Office of Justice Programs, U.S. Department of Justice, 810 Seventh Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20531.

Requirements
Any body armor model submitted by a manufacturer to the NIJ Voluntary Compliance Testing Program on or after the effective date hereof or otherwise not subject to the Transition Provision (below) shall be subject to the following requirements:

1. Satisfaction, as determined by NIJ, of all of the requirements of NIJ Standard 0101.04 (including Addendum B), except as such requirements may be modified hereby;

2. Either –

(a) Submission of evidence (e.g., design drawings and specifications, lists of materials of construction of each component of the model, research, ballistic testing, descriptions of performance characteristics of critical components or materials, etc.) that demonstrates to the satisfaction of NIJ that the model will maintain ballistic performance (consistent with its originally declared threat level) over its declared warranty period; or

(b) Submission, by an officer of the manufacturer who has the authority to bind it, of a written certification, the sufficiency of which shall be determined by NIJ, that –

(1) The model contains no material listed in an NIJ Body Armor Standard Advisory Notice in effect at the time of submission;

(2) Lists the materials of construction of each component of the model;

(3) The officer, on behalf of the manufacturer –

(A) Reasonably believes that the model will maintain ballistic performance (consistent with its originally declared threat level) over its declared warranty period;

(B) Has objective evidence to support that belief; and

(C) Agrees to provide NIJ, promptly on demand, that evidence;

3. Submission, by an officer of the manufacturer who has the authority to bind it, of a written certification, the sufficiency of which shall be determined by NIJ, that labeling of armor shall be in accordance with NIJ Standard 0101.04, except that any references to such standard thereon shall instead be to the "NIJ 2005 Interim Requirements"; and

4. Submission, by an officer of the manufacturer who has the authority to bind it, of a written acknowledgment, the sufficiency of which shall be determined by NIJ, that –

(a) Recent NIJ research findings indicate that certain body armor models that were found by NIJ to be compliant with earlier NIJ requirements for ballistic resistance of new body armor (including NIJ Standard 0101.04) may not adequately maintain ballistic performance during their service life;

(b) NIJ recommends that those who purchase new bullet-resistant body armor select body armor models that comply with the NIJ 2005 Interim Requirements;

(c) NIJ will no longer publish lists of models found by NIJ to be compliant with earlier NIJ requirements for ballistic resistance of new body armor (including NIJ Standard 0101.04); and

(d) Any list or database of compliant body armor models published or sponsored by NIJ will include only models that are found by NIJ to comply with the NIJ 2005 Interim Requirements.

NIJ will issue to the manufacturer an NIJ Notice of Compliance upon determination that these Requirements have been satisfied.

Transition Provision

Any body armor model that was submitted by a manufacturer to NIJ and was found by NIJ to be compliant with NIJ Standard 0101.04 prior to the effective date hereof shall, if made by the same manufacturer, be deemed to comply with the NIJ 2005 Interim Requirements upon issuance to the manufacturer of an NIJ Notice of Compliance. To obtain an NIJ Notice of Compliance, the manufacturer shall submit, with respect to the body armor model –

1. Either –

   (a) The evidence described in Requirements ¶ 2(a); or

   (b) The certification described in Requirements ¶ 2(b)(1) & (2);

2. With respect to armor manufactured more than ten days after the date of the NIJ Notice of Compliance, the certification described in Requirements ¶ 3; and

3. The acknowledgment described in Requirements ¶ 4.

In the event the manufacturer submits a certification pursuant to this Transition Provision ¶ 1(b), the manufacturer also must submit to NIJ, within 90 days of the date of the NIJ Notice of Compliance, the certification described in Requirements ¶ 2(b)(3); if the manufacturer fails to submit this certification, the body armor model shall be deemed no longer to be in compliance with the NIJ 2005 Interim Requirements (and shall be removed from any NIJ list of models that comply with the Requirements) until the manufacturer submits it and NIJ issues a new NIJ Notice of Compliance.

Loss of Compliance Status

A body armor model that is the subject of an NIJ Notice of Compliance shall be deemed no longer to be in compliance with the NIJ 2005 Interim Requirements (and shall be removed from any NIJ list of models that comply with the Requirements) if –

1. NIJ issues an NIJ Body Armor Standard Advisory Notice that identifies a material contained in the model;

2. NIJ determines that any certification or acknowledgment submitted with respect to the model is insufficient or inaccurate;

3. The manufacturer fails to provide NIJ promptly on demand the evidence described in Requirements ¶ 2(b)(3); or

4. NIJ determines, at any time, that the evidence provided to NIJ as described in Requirements ¶ 2(b)(3) and/or in connection with the model is insufficient to demonstrate to the satisfaction of NIJ that the model will maintain its ballistic performance (consistent with its originally declared threat level) over its declared warranty period.

Once a body armor model loses compliance status under this provision, the model will remain out of compliance unless and until NIJ issues a new NIJ Notice of Compliance, following the submission of such evidence (e.g., evidence described in Requirements ¶ 2(a)), documentation, information, or other material as NIJ may require.

Labeling after Loss of Compliance Status

Armor manufactured during a period in which the armor model does not comply (or is deemed not to comply) with the NIJ 2005 Interim Requirements shall not be labeled as compliant with them.

NIJ Body Armor Standard Advisory Notice #01-2005

EFFECTIVE DATE: AUGUST 24, 2005

SUBJECT: Poly-p-phenylene benzobisoxazole (PBO or Zylon®)

The National Institute of Justice (NIJ) hereby advises that it has identified poly-p-phenylene benzobisoxazole (commonly known as PBO or Zylon®) as a material that appears to create a risk of death or serious injury as a result of degraded ballistic performance when used in body armor. This is an NIJ Body Armor Standard Advisory Notice within the meaning of the NIJ 2005 Interim Requirements for Bullet-Resistant Body Armor (effective _____, 2005).

NIJ encourages public safety officers to continue to wear their Zylon®-containing armor until it is replaced. Wearing armor that may have degraded ballistic performance is better than not wearing any armor.

Talking Points
Third Status Report to the Attorney General on Body Armor Safety Initiative Testing and Activities

- Bullet-resistant vests were introduced more than 30 years ago. Since then, they have saved the lives of more than 2,900 law enforcement officers. Research funded by the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) led to the introduction of soft body armor for law enforcement. DOJ continues to work to ensure the safety of officers who wear these vests.

- Through the National Institute of Justice (NIJ), DOJ has operated a voluntary body armor compliance testing program for the past 20 years to establish standards for the performance of bullet-resistant body armor.

- The body armor compliance testing program helps assess the ballistic-resistant performance (the ability of the armor to stop a bullet and reduce blunt trauma) of new armor models. The testing program does not address the performance of used armor (i.e., armor that has been in service).

- Bullet-resistant armors are becoming lighter and more flexible as manufacturers use new materials and designs to offer enhanced ballistic protection with the greatest comfort for the officer.

- In 2003, a Forest Hills, Pennsylvania, police officer was shot and seriously injured when a bullet penetrated the front panel of his Second Chance Body Armor, Inc., Ultima® armor, an armor made of multiple layers of fabric woven from one of the newer materials—Zylon®. The incident was the first NIJ-confirmed case in which any NIJ-compliant body armor model failed to prevent penetration from a bullet it was designed to defeat.

- In response to the Forest Hills incident and concerns from the public safety community, Attorney General John Ashcroft established the Body Armor Safety Initiative to review the performance of bullet-resistant Zylon®-containing body armor and the compliance testing process for new armor models.

- Although testing to date has not revealed the cause of the Forest Hills penetration, it has revealed that the level of protection provided by Zylon®-containing armor decreases significantly over time as a result of exposure to light and external moisture.

- NIJ has tested more than 100 used Zylon®-containing armors from law enforcement agencies around the country. More than half (58%) experienced at least one penetration during a six-shot ballistic testing series. Only 4 armor vests passed all tests within the limits of NIJ's standard for new body armor.

- Although these results do not conclusively prove that all Zylon®-containing body armor models have performance problems, the results clearly show that used Zylon®-containing body armor may not provide the intended level of ballistic resistance.

- Testing has also shown that the physical appearance of Zylon®-containing body armor cannot be relied upon as an indicator of ballistic performance.

- In response to these findings, DOJ will take the following steps:
  - NIJ will adopt interim changes to its body armor compliance testing program to aid in ensuring that officers are protected by body armor that maintains its ballistic performance during its entire warranty period. Under new NIJ 2005 Interim Requirements, models containing Zylon® will not be compliant, unless their manufacturers provide satisfactory evidence to NIJ that the models will maintain their ballistic performance over their declared warranty period.
  - NIJ will recommend that those who purchase new bullet-resistant body armor select body armor models that comply with the new 2005 Interim Requirements.
  - NIJ will expand its research program to provide a better understanding of degradation mechanisms of other ballistic materials and how they affect armor performance. NIJ will also continue its research to assist in developing nondestructive methods for testing the ongoing performance of body armor.
  - The Bureau of Justice Assistance (BJA), which administers the Bulletproof Vest Partnership (BVP) Program, will not make payments for new orders placed for any bullet-resistant body armor model that does not comply with NIJ's 2005 Interim Requirements.
  - In addition, DOJ will make available $33.6 million to distribute through the BVP Program to law enforcement to assist in the replacement of Zylon® -based body armor.

- DOJ continues to strongly encourage public safety officers to wear their Zylon®-containing body armor until it is replaced. Even armor that may have degraded ballistic performance is better than no armor.

- Helping to ensure the safety of public safety officers and the safety and performance of their equipment is a Department of Justice priority.

Q&A
Third Status Report to the Attorney General on Body Armor Safety Initiative Testing and Activities
August 24, 2005

1. What is the Attorney General's Body Armor Safety Initiative?

   On November 17, 2003, Attorney General John Ashcroft announced a body armor safety initiative in response to concerns from the law enforcement community regarding the effectiveness of bullet-resistant armor. These concerns followed the failure of a relatively new Zylon®-based body armor worn by a Forest Hills, Pennsylvania, police officer. Attorney General John Ashcroft directed the National Institute of Justice (NIJ) to initiate an examination of Zylon®-containing bullet-resistant armor (both new and used), to analyze upgrade kits provided by manufacturers to retrofit Zylon®-containing armors, and to review the existing process by which bullet-resistant armor is tested to determine if the process needs modification. To accomplish these goals, NIJ has worked in collaboration with its technical partners, the Office of Law Enforcement Standards (OLES) at the National Institute of Standards and Technology (NIST) and the National Law Enforcement and Corrections Technology Center (NLECTC) in Rockville, Maryland.

   NIJ has issued three status reports to the Attorney General containing results from its body armor studies. These reports are available at https://vests.ojp.gov/index.jsp.

2. Thus far, what has the Department of Justice's research discovered concerning Zylon®-containing bullet-resistant armor?

   - Used Zylon®-containing armor may not provide the intended level of ballistic protection.
   - Of 103 used Zylon®-containing armors tested by NIJ, 60 (58%) were penetrated by at least one round during a six-shot test series. Of those that passed penetration testing, 91% showed backface deformation in excess of that allowed by the NIJ standard for new armor. Only four armors met all performance criteria expected under the NIJ standard for new body armor compliance.
   - Zylon® yarns taken from used armor samples exhibited degraded tensile strength characteristics.
   - A visual inspection of body armor and its ballistic panels does not indicate whether a particular piece of Zylon®-containing body armor has maintained its ballistic performance.

- A sealed tube study confirmed that if PBO[1] is isolated from external sources of moisture there is no significant change in its properties.

Prior NIJ status reports included the following additional findings:

- Ballistic-resistant material, including Zylon®, can degrade due to environmental factors, thus reducing the ballistic resistance safety margin that manufacturers build into their armor designs.
- The ultimate tensile strength of single yarns removed from the rear panel of the Forest Hills armor was up to 30% lower than that of yarns from "new armor" supplied by the manufacturer. Artificially aged armors of the same type that failed in the Forest Hills incident were ballistically tested but no bullet penetrations occurred.[2]
- The "upgrade kits"[3] tested by NIJ did not appear to bring used armor up to the level of performance of new armor. However, used armors with upgrade kits performed better than the used armor alone.

3. What is NIJ doing in response to these findings?

- NIJ is taking the following steps:
  - NIJ intends to adopt new interim requirements for its body armor compliance testing program to aid in ensuring that officers are protected by body armor that maintains its ballistic performance during its entire warranty period. These actions are set forth in detail in Section VI of the Third Status Report to the Attorney General on Body Armor Safety Initiative Testing and Activities. Under the NIJ 2005 Interim Requirements for Bullet-Resistant Body Armor, armor models containing PBO or Zylon® will not be compliant, unless their manufacturers provide satisfactory evidence to NIJ that the models will maintain their ballistic performance over their declared warranty period. Also, manufacturers will be required to submit information concerning materials used in the construction of any armor submitted for compliance testing by NIJ.
  - In the future, NIJ will issue advisories to the field regarding materials used in the construction of body armor that appear to create a risk of death or serious injury as a result of degraded ballistic performance. Any body armor model that contains any material listed in such an advisory will be deemed no longer NIJ-

1 PBO: PBO fiber – poly-p-phenylene benzobisoxazole, the chemical basis for Zylon®.

2 NIJ continues to study the Forest Hills body armor penetration to resolve the cause of that failure.

3 Upgrade kits were provided by the body armor manufacturer, Second Chance, to retrofit Zylon®-based bullet-resistant armors.

compliant unless and until the manufacturer satisfies NIJ that the model will maintain its ballistic performance over its declared warranty period.

- NIJ is expanding its research program to provide a better understanding of degradation mechanisms of other ballistic materials and how they affect armor performance. NIJ will also continue its research to assist in developing nondestructive methods for testing the ongoing performance of body armor.

4. Why is NIJ adopting interim changes to its compliance testing process?

There are limited data concerning the ongoing performance of ballistic-resistant materials and associated armor systems currently in widespread use in the United States. Also, there is no accepted test protocol to evaluate the performance of used body armor over a period of years of typical law enforcement use. Future testing and research will support the development of a comprehensive and scientifically-rigorous compliance testing process to help assure officers that their armor will continue to protect them over the armor's full warranty period.

5. Does this mean that NIJ will no longer be testing Zylon®-containing body armor?

Zylon®-containing armor models will be eligible for NIJ compliance testing if the manufacturer can provide satisfactory evidence to NIJ that the armor model will maintain the intended level of ballistic performance throughout the warranty period.

6. What specific Zylon®-containing body armor models have been tested in the Body Armor Safety Initiative?

A complete list of all body armor models tested (and the results) is contained in the Third Status Report to the Attorney General on Body Armor Safety Initiative Testing and Activities, which can be found at https://vests.ojp.gov/index.jsp.

7. What about the testing of body armor that does not contain Zylon®?

The Body Armor Safety Initiative focused on Zylon®-based body armor. Future phases of this initiative will examine other commonly used ballistic-resistant materials.

8. My Zylon®-containing armor is not a model that was tested as part of the Body Armor Safety Initiative. Should I replace it?

While current testing results do not conclusively prove that all Zylon®-containing body armor models have performance issues, the results clearly show that used Zylon®-containing body armor may not provide the intended level of ballistic resistance. In considering whether to replace body armor, NIJ's research findings should be carefully reviewed, since there were performance variations among the Zylon®-containing armors that were tested.

9. How long is newly purchased Zylon®-containing body armor safe to use?

   Based upon the results of NIJ's research, there is no clear correlation between armor age and ballistic performance. The research indicates that Zylon®-containing armor that is more than two years old may demonstrate significant ballistic degradation. As the armor samples that were tested did not include a significant number of armors that were less than two years old, the performance of newer armors cannot be predicted.

10. I have closely followed all of the care instructions provided by the manufacturer of my armor and my vest looks like new. Does this mean that purchasing replacement armor may not be necessary?

    Based on NIJ's findings, there appears to be no correlation between the appearance of Zylon®-containing armor and ballistic performance in NIJ's testing. The results imply that a visual inspection of the armor and its ballistic panels does not indicate whether a particular piece of Zylon®-containing body armor will perform acceptably. Nonetheless, users are strongly urged to follow all care instructions for their armor.

11. Are there other lightweight ballistic armors available that I can purchase?

    The Department of Justice cannot recommend any specific body armor model for purchase. NIJ is replacing the list of armor compliant with NIJ Standard 0101.04 with a new database of armor compliant with the NIJ 2005 Interim Requirements. A database of compliant armor will be maintained at http://www.justnet.org.

12. When will further test results be forthcoming?

    NIJ is conducting its scientific examination as quickly as possible. Further status reports to the Attorney General will be posted on the Bulletproof Vest Partnership Program website (https://vests.ojp.gov/index.jsp). Additional reports on body armor testing and research results will be provided to law enforcement as soon as possible after the test data have been obtained.

13. In light of these current research findings, is the Department of Justice establishing any new or additional funding assistance for the purchase of replacement body armor?

    Funding provided by the Department of Justice for body armor purchases is coordinated and administered through the Office of Justice Programs' Bureau of Justice Assistance's Bulletproof Vest Partnership (BVP) Program. To better meet the vest replacement needs of America's law enforcement agencies this year, the Department will make available $10 million, in addition to the $23.6 million available through the FY 2005 BVP Program, for bullet-resistant body armor. For information regarding this special BVP solicitation visit: http://www.ojp.usdoj.gov/BJA/grant/bulletproof.html. More details about the BVP program may be found at: https://vests.ojp.gov/index.jsp.

14. What is the Department of Justice doing to keep law enforcement officers informed about the latest developments in the ongoing analysis and study of armors?

A new web resource entitled "Body Armor Safety Initiative" has been incorporated into the Internet-based Bulletproof Vest Partnership Program application at https://vests.ojp.gov/index.jsp, with links and information on official government and industry statements, the Vest Safety Initiative Summit, current evaluation activities, and FAQ's. Additionally, BVP applicants are now alerted whenever they select armor that contains Zylon® in their BVP application. For additional information, including the database of body armor models that comply with the NIJ 2005 Interim Requirements, see http://www.justnet.org.

15. My body armor contains Zylon®. Should I stop wearing it?

Absolutely not. NIJ urges officers to continue to wear the armor that is issued or authorized by their agencies. An officer's risk of fatality is 14 times greater when not wearing body armor. Since bullet-resistant vests were introduced more than 30 years ago, they have saved 2,900 lives and officer homicides have decreased by two-thirds. Even armor that may have degraded ballistic performance is better than no armor.

NIJ will continue to provide timely results on our ongoing examination of Zylon®-based armors to assist in future decisions.

SUBJECT: Advance Notification of BJS Publication

PURPOSE: To provide the Attorney General with advance copies and notification of the pending publication of Felony Defendants in Large Urban Counties, 2002 (NCJ 210818), by Thomas Cohen and Brian Reaves of BJS.

DISCUSSION: Felony Defendants in Large Urban Counties, 2002 presents data collected from a representative sample of felony cases filed in the Nation's 75 largest counties during May 2002. The cases are tracked for up to one year to provide a complete overview of the processing of felony defendants from filing to disposition and sentencing. Data collected include current arrest charges, demographic characteristics, prior arrests and convictions, criminal justice status at arrest, type of pretrial release or detention, bail amount, court appearance record, adjudication outcome, and sentence received if convicted. This periodic report has been published biennially since 1990. Highlights for 2002 include the following:

• Since 1990, defendants charged with a drug or property offense have comprised about two-thirds of felony cases in the 75 largest counties. Since 1994, drug defendants have comprised the largest group, ranging from 35% to 37%. Property defendants have accounted for 29% to 31% of defendants during this time. From 1990 to 2002 the percentage of felony defendants charged with a violent offense has ranged from 24% to 27%.

• An estimated 56,146 felony cases were filed in the State courts of the Nation's 75 largest counties during May 2002. About a fourth of defendants were charged with a violent offense, usually assault (12.7%) or robbery (5.4%). About 1 in 40 defendants were charged with murder (0.8%) or rape (1.8%).

• Non-Hispanic blacks comprised more than half of the defendants charged with murder (58%), robbery (54%), a weapons offense (54%), or drug trafficking (53%). Non-Hispanic whites were nearly half of those charged with a driving-related felony (46%).

• At the time of arrest 32% of defendants had an active criminal justice status, such as probation (15%), release pending disposition of a prior case (10%), or parole (5%).

• Seventy-six percent of all defendants had been arrested previously, with 50% having at least five prior arrest charges. Fifty-nine percent of defendants had at least one prior conviction.

• An estimated 62% of felony defendants in the 75 largest counties were released prior to the final disposition of their case. Defendants were most likely to be released on commercial surety bond (41% of all releases), followed by release on personal recognizance (23% of all releases).

• An estimated 33% of released defendants committed one or more types of pretrial misconduct such as failing to make a court appearance or being rearrested for a new crime.

• Fifty-seven percent of defendants were convicted of a felony and 11% of a misdemeanor. Nearly all convictions (95%) obtained during the 1-year study period were the result of a guilty plea.

• Three-fourths of all sentences for felony convictions were either to prison (38%) or jail (37%). Nearly all convicted defendants who did not receive an incarceration sentence were placed on probation.

• The felony conviction rate reached a high of 61% in 1994 and then fell to 52% in 1998 and 2000. In 2002, the felony conviction rate rose to 57%. The incarceration rate for defendants convicted of a felony rose from a low of 68% in 1994 to a new high of 75% in 2002.

DISSEMINATION: The text and data tabulations will be made available on the Internet for instantaneous dissemination upon release. When printed, this report will be distributed to criminal justice practitioners, policymakers, and others who have indicated an interest in this subject.

TIMETABLE: BJS will make this publication available 30 days from the date of this memorandum.

Felony Defendants in Large Urban Counties, 2002

The State Court Processing Statistics (SCPS) program, initiated by BJS in 1988, entails data collection on the processing of felony cases by State courts in the 75 largest counties. Together, these counties account for about half of all reported serious violent crimes in the U.S., and about two-fifths of all reported serious property crimes. The data collection involves the development of a representative sample of felony arrestees in the 75 largest counties whose cases are then tracked for up to one year in order to determine the outcome of decision-making at each phase of the justice system. SCPS provides comprehensive case processing data on felony defendants from arrest through sentencing, including defendant demographics, criminal history, pretrial release and bail decisions, failure to appear and rearrest rates while on release, adjudication outcome, and type and length of sentence received if convicted. The SCPS data collection is conducted every two years, sampling felony cases filed in May of even-numbered years. It also serves as a platform for targeted studies of special populations such as the processing of waived juvenile defendants and domestic violence defendants. It results in the biennial production of the report "Felony Defendants in Large Urban Counties." The publication of this report is not mandated by statute.

The following questions are examples of questions that may be answered with SCPS data.

1. What proportion of felony defendants are charged with crimes of violence or drug-related crimes? Among felony cases filed in May 2002 in the 75 largest counties, 24% involved a violent offense. About half of these were assault cases. Approximately 2% of all felony defendants were charged with rape and about 1% with murder. Drug offenses (36%) comprised the largest percentage of cases. Nearly half of drug defendants were charged with trafficking. The other two major categories of felony charges were property offenses (30% of defendants) and public-order offenses (10%).

2. How many felony defendants are "repeat offenders"? A majority (59%) of felony defendants had at least one previous conviction. Twenty-four percent had five or more prior convictions. Forty-three percent of defendants had at least one prior felony conviction, including 29% who had more than one. Eleven percent of defendants had a prior conviction for a violent felony.

3. How many felony defendants are released from custody before their case is heard, and how many of these fail to appear in court or are rearrested while in a release status? An estimated 62% of felony defendants were released prior to the disposition of their case, ranging from 8% of murder defendants to 80% of fraud defendants. Approximately a third of released defendants failed to comply with the terms of their pretrial release. Twenty-two percent of released defendants failed to appear in court as scheduled and 18% were arrested for a new offense, including 12% for a new felony.

4. What is the probability of conviction for felony defendants? Among those felony defendants whose cases were adjudicated within the one-year tracking period (88% of cases), 68% were convicted. This included a 57% felony conviction rate (the remainder were convicted of misdemeanors). Felony conviction rates were highest for defendants originally charged with murder (80%), a driving-related offense (73%), motor vehicle theft (68%), burglary (66%), or drug trafficking (64%). They were lowest for assault (41%) defendants.

5. What is the typical sentence for a convicted felon? Seventy-two percent of convictions resulted in a sentence to incarceration (prison or jail). A majority of defendants convicted of murder (95%), robbery (73%), or rape (64%) were sentenced to prison. These defendants also received the longest median prison sentences: 40 years for murder, 10 years for rape, and 6 years for robbery.

6. What are the pretrial release, felony conviction, and sentencing trends for felony defendants processed in State courts from 1990 - 2002? From 1990 - 2002, the percentage of defendants released prior to case disposition ranged from 62% to 64%. The felony conviction rates reached a high of 61% of defendants in the 1994 study, fell to 52% in 1998 and 2000, and rose to 57% in 2002. The incarceration rate for defendants convicted of a felony rose from a low of 68% in 1994 to a new high of 75% in 2002. From 1990 - 1994, felony convictions were more likely to result in a prison than a jail sentence; afterwards, felony convictions resulted in nearly equal rates of prison and jail incarcerations.

Highlights

Trends in processing of felony defendants, 1990-2002

Since 1990, defendants charged with a drug or property offense have comprised about two-thirds of felony cases in the 75 largest counties. Since 1994, drug defendants have comprised the largest group, ranging from 35% to 37%. Property defendants have accounted for 29% to 31% of defendants during this time. From 1990 to 2002 the percentage of felony defendants charged with a violent offense has ranged from 24% to 27%.

The proportion of defendants over age 40 has risen from 10% in 1990, to 21% in 2000 and 2002. Since 1996, about a third of defendants have been under age 25, a smaller proportion than from 1990 to 1994, when about two-fifths of defendants were this young.

The percentage of female defendants increased from 14% in 1990 to 18% in 1998 and has remained stable since then. After reaching a peak of 50% in 1996, the percentage of non-Hispanic black defendants declined to 43% in 2002. During this time, the percentage of non-Hispanic white defendants increased from 23% to 31%.

The percentage of defendants with an active criminal justice status at the time of arrest declined to a new low of 32% in 2002, compared to a high of 38% from 1990 through 1994.

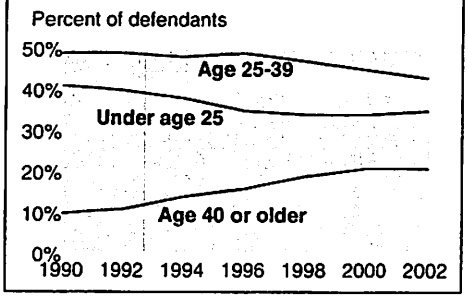
The percentage of defendants with one or more prior felony arrests rose to 64% in 2002, continuing an upward trend that began after 1992 when 55% had a felony arrest record. The percentage with a felony conviction record has also increased — from 36% in 1990 to 43% in 2002.

From 1990 to 2002 the percentage of felony defendants released prior to case disposition remained fairly consistent, ranging from 62% to 64%. From 1990 to 1996 release on personal recognizance (ROR) was the most common type of pretrial release, accounting for 38% to 41% of releases, compared to 29% to 31% for surety bond. In 1998 surety bond was the most frequently used type of release, and by 2002, surety bond accounted for 41% of releases compared to 23% for ROR.

From 1990 to 2002 the percentage of released defendants charged with any type of pretrial misconduct was fairly consistent, ranging from 31% to 34%. Likewise, failure-to-appear rates varied only slightly, ranging from 22% to 24%.

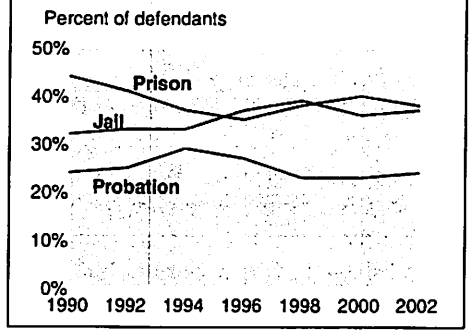
After reaching a high of 61% in the 1994 study, the felony conviction rate fell to 52% in both 1998 and 2000. This decline was reversed in 2002 when 57% of defendants were convicted of a felony. Overall conviction rates have followed a similar pattern, peaking in 1994 at 72%, dropping to 64% by 2000, then rising to 68% in 2002.

After reaching a low of 68% in 1994, the incarceration rate for defendants convicted of a felony rose for the fifth straight year to a new high of 75% in 2002. In 2002 prison and jail sentences occurred with relatively equal frequency, as they did in 1996 and 1998. In other years felony convictions were somewhat more likely to result in a prison sentence than a jail sentence.



Felony defendants in large urban counties, 2002

Arrest charges



An estimated 56,146 felony cases were filed in the State courts of the Nation's 75 largest counties during May 2002. About a fourth of defendants were charged with a violent offense, usually assault (12.7%) or robbery (5.4%). About 1 in 40 defendants were charged with murder (0.8%) or rape (1.8%).

Two-thirds of defendants were charged with either a drug (36%) or property (30%) offense. Nearly half of drug defendants, 17% of defendants overall, were charged with drug trafficking. A majority of property defendants were charged with larceny/theft (8.8% of all defendants) or burglary (8.1%). About 10% of defendants were charged with a public-order offense. A majority of these charges were driving-related (3.2%) or weapons-related (2.7%).

Age at arrest, felony defendants in the 75 largest counties, 1990-2002

Most severe sentence received by defendants convicted of a felony in the 75 largest counties, 1990-2002

Demographic characteristics

Eighty-two percent of defendants were male, including 90% or more of those charged with rape (99%), a weapons offense (96%), murder (93%), or robbery (90%). Women accounted for about half of the defendants charged with fraud (49%) and about a third of those charged with forgery (35%).

Non-Hispanic blacks comprised more than half of the defendants charged with murder (58%), robbery (54%), a weapons offense (54%), or drug trafficking (53%). Non-Hispanic whites were nearly half of those charged with a driving-related felony (46%).

Half of defendants were under age 30. Eighteen percent were under age 21, including 36% of those charged with robbery and 28% of those charged with murder. Two percent of defendants were under age 18, including 9% of robbery defendants and 8% of murder defendants.

Criminal history

At the time of arrest 32% of defendants had an active criminal justice status, such as probation (15%), release pending disposition of a prior case (10%), or parole (5%). Forty-five percent of motor vehicle theft defendants and 40% of burglary defendants had a criminal justice status when arrested.

Seventy-six percent of all defendants had been arrested previously, with 50% having at least five prior arrest charges. Sixty-four percent of defendants had a felony arrest record. Fifty-nine percent of defendants had at least one prior conviction, including 43% with one or more felony convictions.

Pretrial release and detention

Thirty-eight percent of all defendants were detained until the court disposed of their case, including 6% who were denied bail. Murder defendants (92%) were the most likely to be detained. A majority of defendants charged with robbery (58%), motor vehicle theft (56%), or burglary (51%) were also detained until case disposition.

Defendants with an active criminal justice status (57%) were nearly twice as likely to be detained until case disposition as those without such a status (31%). Defendants on parole (69%) were the most likely to be detained.

Defendants were most likely to be released on commercial surety bond (41% of all releases), followed by release on personal recognizance (23%). The next most common types of pretrial release were conditional release (18%), deposit bond (10%), and unsecured bond (5%).

An estimated 33% of released defendants committed one or more types of pretrial misconduct while in a release status. Twenty-two percent failed to appear in court as scheduled. Eighteen percent were arrested for a new offense, including 12% for a felony.

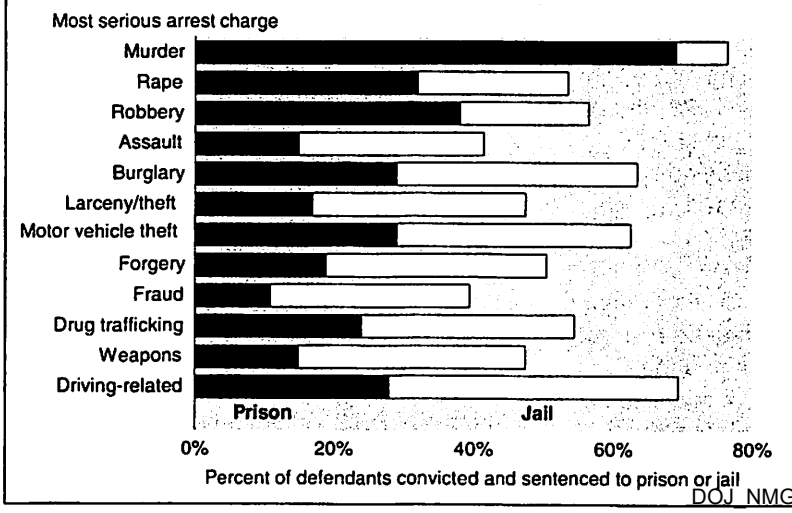
Adjudication

About a fourth of defendants had their case adjudicated within 1 month of arrest, and nearly half within 3 months. At the end of the 1-year study period, 87% of all cases had been adjudicated.

Sixty-eight percent of the cases adjudicated within 1 year resulted in a conviction. Fifty-seven percent of defendants were convicted of a felony, and 11% of a misdemeanor. Felony conviction rates were higher for those originally charged with murder (80%), followed by driving-related offenses (73%), motor vehicle theft (68%), burglary (66%), and drug trafficking (64%). Assault (41%) defendants had the lowest felony conviction rate.

Nearly all (95%) convictions obtained during the 1-year study period were the result of a guilty plea. About 5 in 6 guilty pleas were to a felony.

Eighty-five percent of trials resulted in a guilty verdict, including 88% of bench trials and 80% of jury trials.



Sentencing

About two-thirds of convicted defendants were sentenced within 1 day of adjudication. Three-fourths of all sentences for felony convictions were either to prison (38%) or jail (37%). Ninety-five percent of those convicted of murder were sentenced to prison. A large majority of robbery (73%) and rape (64%) convictions also resulted in prison sentences. Nearly all convicted defendants who did not receive an incarceration sentence were placed on probation.

Fifty-eight percent of those with multiple prior felony convictions were sentenced to prison following a felony conviction in the current case, compared to 22% of those with no prior felony convictions.

The mean prison sentence for violent felony convictions was about 10 years and the median was 5 years. For nonviolent felonies the mean was about 3 years and the median 2 years. Murder (40 years) and rape (10 years) convictions carried the longest median prison sentences. Nearly 2 in 5 convicted murderers received a life sentence.

Probability of being convicted and sentenced to incarceration for felony defendants in the 75 largest counties, 2002

Since 1988, the Bureau of Justice Statistics (BJS) has sponsored a biennial data collection on the processing of felony defendants in the State courts of the Nation's 75 most populous counties. Previously known as the National Pretrial Reporting Program, this data collection series was renamed the State Court Processing Statistics (SCPS) program in 1994 to better reflect the wide range of data elements collected.

The SCPS program collects data on the demographic characteristics, criminal history, pretrial processing, adjudication, and sentencing of felony defendants. The SCPS data do not include Federal defendants. The reader should refer to the annual BJS Compendium of Federal Justice Statistics for information on the processing of Federal defendants.

The 2002 SCPS collected data for 15,358 felony cases filed during May 2002 in 40 large counties. These cases, which were tracked for up to 1 year, were part of a 2-stage sample that was representative of the estimated 56,146 felony cases filed in the Nation's 75 most populous counties during that month. A small number of cases (93 weighted) were omitted from analysis as they could not be classified into 1 of the 4 major crime categories (violent, property, drug, and public-order offenses).

In 2002 the 75 largest counties accounted for 37% of the U.S. population. According to the FBI's Uniform Crime Reports program for 2002, these jurisdictions accounted for 50% of all reported serious violent crimes in the United States, including 61% of robberies, 51% of murders and nonnegligent manslaughters, 47% of aggravated assaults, and 36% of forcible rapes.

These counties accounted for 42% of all reported serious property crimes, including 57% of motor vehicle thefts, 40% of larceny/thefts, and 39% of burglaries.

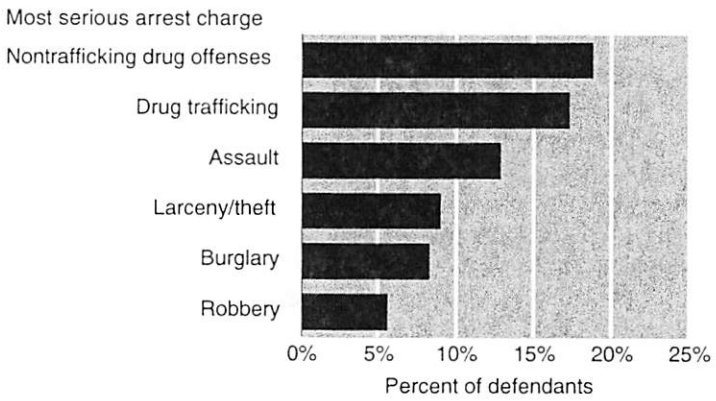
Arrest charges

During May 2002 about a fourth of the felony defendants in the 75 largest counties were charged with a violent offense (24.4%) (table 1). About half of those charged with a violent felony, 12.7% of defendants overall, faced assault charges, and about a fifth, 5.4% of defendants overall, were charged with robbery. Murder defendants comprised 3.5% of the defendants charged with a violent felony, and 0.8% of all felony defendants. Rape defendants accounted for 7.3% of the defendants charged with a violent felony, and 1.8% of all felony defendants. (See Methodology for the specific crimes included in each offense category.)

For about 3 in 8 defendants, the most serious arrest charge was a drug offense (35.8%). Nearly half (48%) of drug defendants were charged with drug trafficking. Overall, defendants were more likely to be charged with drug trafficking (17.1%) or other drug offenses (18.6%) than any other type of offense (figure 1).

About 3 in 10 felony defendants were charged with a property offense (30.3%). More than a fourth of property defendants, 8.8% of defendants overall, were charged with larceny/theft offenses, and about a fourth, 8.1% overall, were charged with burglary.

Defendants charged with a public-order offense comprised 9.6% of all defendants. About 6 in 10 public-order defendants faced a weapons (2.7%) or driving-related (3.2%) charge.



The percentage of felony defendants in the 75 largest counties facing a drug-related charge (35.8%) was about the same as in 2000 (36.8%), but significantly higher than the low of 30% in 1992 (figure 2). The percentage of property defendants in 2002 (30.3%) was relatively unchanged compared to 2000 (29.5%) and lower since a high of 34.7% in 1992. The percentage of defendants charged with a violent offense in 2002 (24.4%) was about the same as in 2000 (24.9%), and slightly lower than the high of 26.5% in 1992.

About 7 in 10 defendants charged with drug trafficking (72%), robbery (71%), or rape (71%) had been charged with one or more additional offenses. More than three-fifths of defendants whose most serious arrest charge was murder (65%), burglary (65%), weapons (64%), and assault (62%) were also charged with one or more additional offenses.

A majority of rape (65%), murder (61%), robbery (59%), and drug trafficking (58%) defendants faced at least one additional felony charge. About half of defendants charged with fraud (52%) or burglary (51%) faced one or more additional felony charges. More than two-fifths of forgery (46%), weapons (43%), and assault (42%) defendants faced multiple felony charges.

Demographic characteristics

Forty-three percent of the felony defendants in the 75 largest counties were non-Hispanic blacks, 31% were non-Hispanic whites, 24% were Hispanics of any race, and 2% were non-Hispanic members of some other race (table 3). Non-Hispanic blacks comprised a majority of the defendants charged with murder (58%), a weapons offense (54%), robbery (54%), or drug trafficking (53%) (figure 3). The smallest percentage of black defendants was found among those charged with a driving-related offense (22%) or motor vehicle theft (27%).

Non-Hispanic whites accounted for the largest percentage among defendants facing driving-related charges (46%). This was about 3 times the percentage accounted for by whites among defendants charged with murder (15%) or a weapons offense (18%), and more than twice the percentage of whites charged with robbery (21%) or drug trafficking (21%).

Hispanics were more prevalent among defendants charged with motor vehicle theft (35%) or a driving-related offense (30%) than among those charged with fraud (15%), forgery (17%), or larceny/theft (19%).

Overall, 82% of felony defendants in the 75 largest counties were male (table 4). Men comprised at least 9 out of 10 defendants charged with rape (99%), weapons offenses (96%), murder (93%), and robbery (90%). Women accounted for 18% of defendants, including 49% of those charged with fraud and 35% of those charged with forgery.

The average age of defendants at the time of arrest was 31 years (table 5). By specific offense the average age ranged from 27 years for robbery defendants to 36 for those charged with a driving-related offense.

Nearly a tenth of robbery (9%) and murder (8%) defendants were under age 18. An estimated 21% of defendants were 40 or older, including about a third of those charged with a driving-related offense (35%). Defendants charged with a weapons offense (10%), robbery (11%), motor vehicle theft (11%), or murder (12%) were the least likely to be 40 or older.

Overall, 35% of defendants were under age 25 (figure 4). More than half of robbery defendants (55%) were under age 25, as were more than two-fifths of defendants charged with murder (48%), a weapons offense (48%), vehicle theft (45%), or burglary (43%). Defendants charged with a driving-related offense (16%) or fraud (21%) were the least likely to be under age 25.

An estimated 18% of defendants were under the age of 21 at the time of arrest. Nearly 3 in 8 robbery defendants (36%) were under age 21, as were about a fourth of those charged with murder (28%), vehicle theft (26%), a weapons offense (25%), or burglary (25%). Defendants charged with a driving-related offense (3%), fraud (9%), or forgery (9%) were the least likely to be this young.

Males formed a higher percentage of defendants under the age of 18 (90%) than in the 25 or older age categories (table 6). A majority of the defendants under age 18 were black (55%), compared to less than half in each of the other age groups.

Black males comprised the largest proportion of defendants in each age group (figure 5). This effect was most pronounced in the under-age-18 category in which black males (50%) accounted for more than 3 times the percentage of white males (15%), and twice the percentage of Hispanic males (25%). It was less pronounced in the age 25 to 39 categories, where black males accounted for a proportion of defendants closer to that accounted for by Hispanic and white males.

Hispanic females comprised less than 5% of defendants in each age group. Black females constituted a similar percentage to white females in all age categories, and neither accounted for more than 10% of the defendants in any single age category.

Criminal justice status at time of arrest

Thirty-two percent of felony defendants had an active criminal justice status at the time of their arrest on the current felony charge (table 7). Among defendants charged with a violent offense, 27% had an active criminal justice status, ranging from 35% of robbery defendants to 21% of rape defendants.

Thirty-seven percent of property defendants had an active criminal justice status, including 45% of defendants charged with motor vehicle theft and 40% of those charged with burglary. Among property defendants, those charged with fraud (22%) were the least likely to have had an active criminal justice status at the time of arrest.

Overall 31% of drug defendants had an active criminal justice status. Those charged with drug trafficking were equally likely as those charged with other drug offenses to have had a criminal justice status.

Thirty-three percent of public-order defendants had an active criminal justice status at the time of the current arrest. This included 29% of those charged with a weapons offense, 33% of those charged with a driving-related offense, and 35% of those charged with other public-order offenses.

Some defendants with a criminal justice status had more than one type of status. When just the most serious criminal justice status is considered, 15% of defendants were on probation, 10% had been released pending disposition of a previous case, and 5% were on parole at the time of the current arrest. Allowing for multiple types of criminal justice status, 5% of defendants were on parole, 16% were on probation, and 11% had been released pending case disposition.

The percentage of defendants on parole at the time of their current felony arrest ranged from 9% of those charged with motor vehicle theft to 2% of those charged with rape (figure 6). Other offenses with at least 6% of the defendants on parole at the time of arrest included murder (7%), burglary (6%) and drug trafficking (6%).

Nearly a fourth of defendants charged with motor vehicle theft (24%) or burglary (23%) were on probation at the time of arrest. This was about twice the percentage of defendants charged with rape (11%) or fraud (11%) on probation at the time of arrest.

About 1 in 6 defendants charged with drug trafficking (18%) or robbery (17%) were on release pending disposition of a prior case when they were arrested on the current felony charge. These defendants were more than 3 times as likely as those charged with murder (5%) to have had such a status at the time of the current arrest.

Prior arrests

Seventy-six percent of all defendants had at least one prior felony or misdemeanor arrest (table 8). Defendants whose most serious current arrest charge was for a public-order (80%) or drug (79%) offense were more likely to have been previously arrested than those charged with a property (75%) or violent (72%) offense.

Among defendants charged with a violent offense, robbery (78%) and assault (74%) defendants were more likely to have an arrest record than those charged with rape (61%).

About 4 in 5 property defendants charged with motor vehicle theft (80%) or burglary (79%) had been arrested previously. This was true for about 3 in 4 defendants charged with forgery (75%) or larceny/theft (74%). Defendants charged with fraud (60%) were the least likely, among property defendants, to have one or more prior arrests.

Among public-order defendants, defendants charged with a driving-related felony (83%) were more likely to have an arrest record than those facing weapon charges (75%).

Among defendants with an arrest record, about 7 in 8 had more than one prior arrest charge, and a majority had at least five. Overall, 69% of defendants had two or more prior arrest charges, and 50% had five or more. Over half of defendants charged with motor vehicle theft (55%), a driving-related offense (54%), burglary (53%), or murder (52%) had five or more prior arrest charges. About a third of defendants charged with rape (32%) or fraud (32%) had five or more prior arrest charges.

An estimated 31% of defendants had 10 or more prior arrest charges. This included 35% of defendants charged with murder, burglary, or motor vehicle theft.

About two-thirds of the defendants under age 18 had no previous arrests (figure 7). This proportion dropped to about two-fifths among defendants age 18 to 20, to just under a fourth among those aged 21 to 29, and about a sixth among those age 30 to 49. Nearly 1 in 4 defendants age 50 or older had no arrest record.

Approximately a fourth of the defendants age 18 to 20 had five or more prior arrests. This proportion rose to about two-fifths in the 21-to-24 age range, about half in the 25-to-29 age range, and around three-fifths in the 30-to-49 age range. In the latter age range, defendants were approximately 4 times as likely to have five or more prior arrests as no prior arrests.

Among defendants with an arrest record, about 4 in 5 had been arrested at least once for a felony. Overall, 64% of defendants had a felony arrest record (table 9). About half of all defendants had multiple prior felony arrest charges, including 30% with five or more.

About 3 in 5 of the defendants facing a current charge for a violent felony had been previously arrested for a felony, including 70% of robbery defendants and 64% of murder defendants. Thirty-six percent of murder defendants had 5 or more prior felony arrest charges, including 19% with 10 or more.

Sixty-three percent of property defendants had one or more prior felony arrests. More than two-thirds of those currently charged with motor vehicle theft (71%) or burglary (68%) had a prior felony arrest record. Eighteen percent of burglary and motor vehicle theft defendants had 10 or more prior felony arrest charges.

Sixty-seven percent of drug defendants had at least one prior felony arrest charge, and 31% had five or more.

Sixty-four percent of public-order defendants had been previously arrested for a felony, including 31% with five or more prior felony charges.

Fifty-nine percent of felony defendants in the 75 largest counties had at least one prior conviction for a misdemeanor or a felony (table 10). Nearly four-fifths of those with a conviction record, accounting for 46% of defendants overall, had more than one prior conviction. Twenty-four percent of all defendants had five or more prior convictions.

Among defendants charged with a violent offense, 51% had at least one prior conviction. Murder (56%), robbery (53%), and assault (53%) defendants were the most likely to have a conviction record and rape defendants (39%) the least.

Fifty-nine percent of property defendants had been convicted previously, including 64% of burglary and motor vehicle theft defendants. Fifty-one percent of burglary and motor vehicle theft defendants also had multiple prior convictions.

Sixty-three percent of drug defendants had at least one prior conviction. Half had two or more, and a fourth had at least five.

Among public-order defendants, 65% had a conviction record, and 27% had five or more. Nearly three-fourths of the defendants facing driving-related charges (73%) had at least one prior conviction of some type, and about three-fifths had multiple prior convictions.

Ninety percent of defendants under age 18 at the time of the current arrest had no prior adult convictions (figure 8). Seven percent of these defendants had been previously convicted of at least one felony. In the 18-to-20 age range, 66% of defendants had no prior convictions, while 20% had at least one prior felony conviction.

A majority of the defendants age 21 or older had a conviction record, and defendants ages 25 to 49 were more likely to have a felony conviction record than no prior convictions. About half of defendants age 30 to 49 had a felony conviction record.

For about a fourth of the defendants with a prior felony conviction, 11% of defendants overall, their criminal history included at least one conviction for a violent felony (table 12). Fourteen percent of the defendants currently charged with a violent offense had a prior conviction for a violent felony.

By specific arrest charge, the percentage of defendants previously convicted of a violent felony ranged from 21% of murder defendants to 5% of defendants charged with fraud (figure 9).

For 39% of motor vehicle theft defendants, the most serious prior conviction was a nonviolent felony. This was also the case for 36% of defendants charged with burglary, and 34% of those charged with drug trafficking or a driving-related offense.

Defendants charged with a driving-related offense (27%) were much more likely than other defendants to have a conviction record that consisted only of misdemeanors.

Rates of release and detention

An estimated 62% of felony defendants in the 75 largest counties were released prior to the final disposition of their case (table 13). By general offense category, defendants charged with a violent offense (55%) were less likely to be released than those whose most serious arrest charge was a public-order (68%) or drug (66%) offense.

Within the violent offense category, release rates varied greatly. Just 8% of murder defendants were released compared to 62% of those charged with assault. Fifty-five percent of rape defendants and 42% of robbery defendants were released before the court disposed of their case.

Among defendants charged with a property offense, under half of those charged with burglary (49%) or motor vehicle theft (44%) were released prior to case disposition. Higher proportions of those charged with fraud (80%), forgery (64%), or larceny/theft (64%) were released.

About two-thirds of drug defendants charged with drug trafficking (65%) or with other drug offenses (68%) were released prior to the disposition of their case. Among public-order defendants, at least two-thirds of those charged with a driving-related (70%), weapons (68%), or public-order offense (67%) were released.

Among the 38% of defendants who were detained in jail until case disposition, about 5 in 6 had a bail amount set but did not post the money required to secure release. Detained murder defendants were the exception to this rule; a slight majority of them, 49% of murder defendants overall, were ordered held without bail (figure 10). Overall, 6% of felony defendants in the 75 largest counties were denied bail.

A slight majority of the defendants released prior to case disposition, 34% of defendants overall, were released under financial conditions that required the posting of bail (see Methodology for definitions related to pretrial release) (table 14). The most common type of release was surety bond (26% of all defendants and 41% of released defendants), which involves the services of a commercial bail bond agent (figure 11).

Other types of financial release were deposit bond (6% of all defendants and 10% of released defendants), full cash bond (2% and 3%), and property bond (less than 1%). All of these types of bonds are posted directly with the court without the use of a bail bond agent.

Less than half of released defendants, 28% of defendants overall, were released under nonfinancial conditions not requiring the posting of bail (table 14).

Release on personal recognizance (14% of all defendants and 23% of released defendants) and conditional release (11% of all defendants and 18% of released defendants), were the types of nonfinancial release used most often.

A small number of defendants were released prior to case disposition as the result of an emergency release used to relieve jail crowding. Such releases did not involve the use of any of the release types mentioned above.

Bail amounts

Overall, 66% of felony defendants had a bail amount set by the court, and were required to post all or part of that amount to secure release while their case was pending. The remainder were granted nonfinancial release (28%), ordered held without bail (6%), or were part of an emergency release (less than 0.5%). More than half of those with a bail amount had it set at $10,000 or more, and a fifth had it set at $50,000 or more (table 15).

Among defendants with a bail amount set, those charged with a violent offense (35%) were about twice as likely as other defendants to have it set at $50,000 or more. About 5 in 6 murder defendants (83%) with a bail amount had it set at $50,000 or more, as did more than two-fifths of rape (44%) and robbery (41%) defendants.

Among property defendants with a bail amount set, those charged with burglary (20%) or motor vehicle theft (20%) were the most likely to have bail set at $50,000 or more. Defendants charged with drug trafficking (22%) were nearly twice as likely to have bail set at $50,000 or more as other drug defendants (12%). Among public-order defendants 20% of those charged with a weapons offense and 17% of those charged with a driving-related offense had bail set at $50,000.

Overall, defendants who were detained until case disposition had a median bail amount 5 times that of defendants who secured release ($25,000 versus $5,000) (table 16). The mean bail amount for detained defendants ($83,300) was more than 5 times that of defendants who secured release ($15,200).

Detained murder defendants had the highest median ($250,000) and mean ($620,900) bail amounts. Overall, the median bail amount for murder defendants was $250,000 and the mean was $574,900.

Overall, about half (51%) of defendants who were required to post bail to secure release did so. Among defendants with a bail set at under $5,000, 74% posted the amount needed for release, as did 67% of those with a bail amount of $5,000 to $9,999 (figure 12). In contrast, just 16% of the defendants with bail set at $50,000 or more, and 38% of those with a bail amount of $25,000 to $49,999 met the financial conditions required for release.

Among defendants given financial release, the median and mean bail amounts were slightly higher for those released on surety bond ($7,000, $17,500) than for those released on deposit bond ($5,000, $8,500). Defendants released on full cash bond posted a median of $1,500 and a mean of $5,700 to secure release.

Type of release bond	Bail amount Median	Mean
Surety	$7,000	$17,500
Deposit	5,000	8,500
Full cash	1,500	5,700
Property	10,000	27,500
Unsecured	$10,000	$11,100

Unlike those released on full cash bond, defendants released on deposit bond generally posted 10% of the full bail amount with the court to secure release. However, they remained liable to the court for the full bail amount if they violated the terms of release.

Those released on surety bond paid a similar fee to a bail bond agent, who assumed liability to the court for the full bail amount if the defendant violated the terms of release.

Defendants released on an unsecured bond had a median bail amount of $10,000 and a mean bail amount of $11,100. These defendants did not have to post any of this amount, but like those on financial release, they were liable for the full bail amount if they violated the terms of release.

Time from arrest to release

Among defendants released prior to case disposition, 48% were released within 1 day of arrest, and 73% within 1 week (table 17). Nearly all releases during the 1-year study occurred within a month of arrest (90%).

By general offense category, less than half of the defendants charged with a drug (44%) or violent (43%) offense were released within 1 day of arrest. A majority of those charged with a public-order (56%) or property (55%) offense were released this quickly.

Just 14% of released murder defendants were released within 1 day of arrest, compared to 66% of those released after being charged with fraud, 64% of those charged with a driving-related offense and 61% of those charged with larceny/theft. After 1 month, just 31% of murder defendant releases had occurred, compared to nearly all of the releases of other defendants.

When differences among offense types are held constant, defendants released under nonfinancial terms generally took longer to secure their release than those who were released under financial conditions. Among defendants who were released under financial conditions, the amount of time from arrest to pretrial release tended to increase as the bail amount did.

Criminal history and probability of release

Court decisions about bail and pretrial release are primarily based on the judgment of whether a defendant will appear in court as scheduled and whether there is potential danger to the community from crimes that a defendant may commit if released. Many States have established specific criteria to be considered by the courts when setting release conditions.

The SCPS data illustrate how release rates vary with some of these factors. For example, 69% of the defendants without an active criminal justice status when arrested for the current offense were released prior to case disposition, compared to 43% of those with such a status (table 18). Defendants on parole (31%) at the time of arrest were the least likely to be released, followed by those on probation (44%). This compared with 54% of those released pending disposition of a prior case.

Seventy-seven percent of the defendants with no prior arrests were released, compared to 57% of those who had been previously arrested. Among defendants with an arrest record, those who had never missed a court appearance (65%) had a higher probability of being released than those who had failed to appear at least once during a previous case (49%).

About three-fourths of defendants without a prior conviction (76%) were released prior to disposition of the current case, compared to about half of those with a conviction record (52%). Among defendants with a conviction record, release rates ranged from 63% for those with a single prior conviction to 44% for those with five or more.

Less than half of the defendants with one or more prior felony convictions (48%) were released prior to disposition of the current case, compared to about two-thirds of those whose prior convictions involved only misdemeanors (65%). Those with a prior conviction for a violent felony (44%) had a slightly lower release rate than those whose most serious prior conviction was for a nonviolent felony (48%).

Conduct of released defendants

Among defendants who were released prior to case disposition, 33% committed some type of misconduct while in a release status (table 19). This may have been in the form of a failure to appear in court, an arrest for a new offense, or some other violation of release conditions that resulted in the revocation of that release by the court.

By original offense category the proportion of defendants charged with pretrial misconduct was highest for drug defendants (40%) and lowest for those released after being charged with a violent offense (22%). Thirty-four percent of defendants charged with a property and 29% of defendants charged with a public-order offense committed some type of pretrial misconduct.

By specific arrest offense, rates of pretrial misconduct were lower among defendants released after being charged with rape (16%), assault (21%), murder (23%), or fraud (23%) than among those released after being charged with motor vehicle theft (38%), drug trafficking (38%), or burglary (39%).

Failure to appear in court

Seventy-eight percent of the defendants who were released prior to case disposition made all scheduled court appearances. Bench warrants for failing to appear in court were issued for the remaining 22% (table 20).

Released drug defendants (29%) had the highest failure-to-appear rate followed by property (21%) and public-order (19%) defendants. Twelve percent of defendants charged with a violent offense failed to appear in court as scheduled, ranging from 15% of robbery defendants to 0% of murder defendants and 9% of rape defendants.

Over a fourth of the defendants who failed to appear in court, 6% of all defendants, were still fugitives at the end of the 1-year study period. The remainder were returned to the court (either voluntarily or not) before the end of the study.

Defendants released after being charged with a drug offense (8%) were more likely to be a fugitive after 1 year than defendants released after being charged with a property (5%), public-order (5%) or violent (4%) offense. No released murder defendants were in a fugitive status at the end of the 1-year study period.

Some of these defendants may have been returned to the court at a later date. Detail may not add to total because of rounding.

Rearrest for a new offense

Overall, 18% of released defendants were rearrested for a new offense allegedly committed while they awaited disposition of their original case (table 21). About two-thirds of these defendants, 12% of all released defendants, were charged with a new felony. By specific original arrest charge, released burglary (24%), murder (23%), motor vehicle theft (23%), and drug (21%) defendants had higher pretrial rearrest rates than defendants originally charged with rape (8%) or fraud (10%).

Twenty-three percent of defendants released after originally being charged with murder were rearrested for a new felony while in a release status (figure 13). This was the case for 18% of defendants released after being charged with burglary or motor vehicle theft.

Misconduct prior to case disposition by released felony defendants in the 75 largest counties, 2002

Time from arrest to adjudication

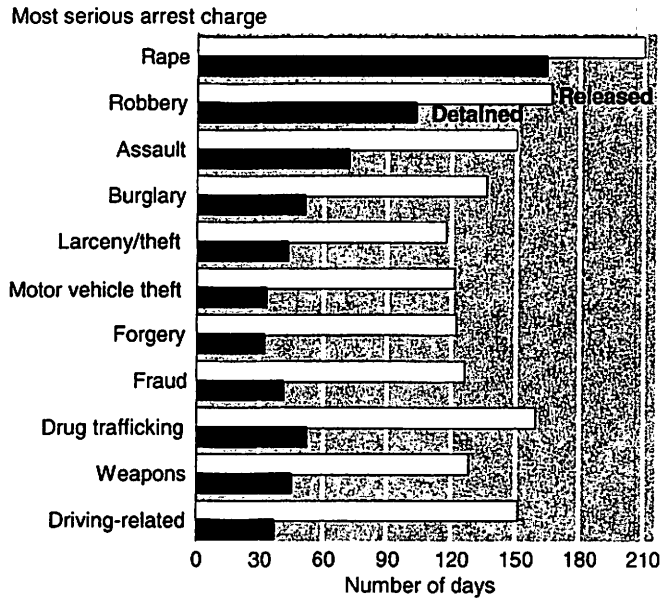
For 48% of felony defendants in the 75 largest counties, adjudication of their case occurred within 3 months of arrest, and 69% of cases were adjudicated within 6 months (table 22). By the end of the 1-year study period, 87% of all cases had been adjudicated.

While the overall median time from arrest to adjudication was 98 days, it was nearly twice this long for rape defendants (186 days), and nearly 4 times this long for murder defendants (361 days). Defendants charged with motor vehicle theft had the shortest median time from arrest to adjudication (50 days).

At the end of the 1-year study period, 50% of murder defendants were awaiting adjudication of their case, compared to 27% of rape defendants, and no more than 21% of the defendants in any other offense category.

Excluding those charged with murder (for which the median for released defendants could not be calculated), the median time from arrest to adjudication was shorter for detained defendants than for those released (figure 14).

For most charged offenses, the median time from arrest to adjudication was nearly 3 months longer for defendants released after being charged than for those detained. The difference was about 3½ months for drug trafficking defendants, and 1½ months for rape defendants. Overall, the median time from arrest to adjudication was 136 days for released defendants compared to 51 days for those detained.



Excluding murder, the longest median time from arrest to adjudication among released defendants was for those charged with rape (209 days), followed by those charged with robbery (165 days), drug trafficking (158 days), or a driving-related offense (150 days). In contrast, detained defendants charged with motor vehicle theft (32 days) or forgery (31 days) had their cases adjudicated in about a month.

Adjudication outcome

Sixty-eight percent of the defendants whose cases were adjudicated within 1 year of arrest were convicted (table 23). A majority of these convictions were for a felony, with 57% of defendants eventually convicted of a felony.

Defendants originally charged with a violent offense (60%) were less likely to be convicted of a felony or a misdemeanor, than those originally charged with a drug (69%), property (72%), or public-order (73%) offense. By specific type of arrest offense, the proportion of defendants convicted ranged from 87% of those charged with a driving-related felony to 55% of those charged with assault.

More than three-fifths of the defendants whose most serious arrest charge was murder (80%), a driving-related offense (73%), motor vehicle theft (68%), burglary (66%), or drug trafficking (64%) were convicted of a felony. A majority of defendants charged with rape (59%), fraud (59%), robbery (58%), forgery (57%), weapons (56%), and larceny/theft (54%) also received a felony conviction. The lowest felony conviction rate was for assault (41%) defendants.

In most cases where the defendant was not convicted, it was because the charges against the defendant were dismissed. An estimated 24% of all cases ended in this way. Defendants charged with assault (36%) were about 3 times as likely to have their case dismissed as those charged with a driving-related offense (10%) or murder (13%).

About 7% of cases had other outcomes such as diversion or deferred adjudication.

Eighty-one percent of the defendants who were detained until case disposition were eventually convicted of some offense, compared to 60% of those released pending disposition (table 24). Nearly three-fourths of detained defendants (72%) were convicted of a felony, compared to about half of released defendants (48%).

To some extent adjudication outcome was related to the number and type of the original arrest charges filed. Seventy-four percent of defendants who originally were charged with more than one felony eventually were convicted of some offense, compared to 64% of the defendants who had no additional felony charges (table 25).

Sixty-five percent of defendants whose original arrest charges included more than one felony eventually were convicted of a felony compared to 52% of those with no additional felony charges. Among the defendants who had no additional felony charges, those who were charged with one or more misdemeanors (44%), were less likely to be convicted of a felony than those who had no additional charges of any type (55%).

Defendants with only one felony charge, but one or more additional misdemeanor charges, were more likely than other defendants to be eventually convicted of a misdemeanor (20%). This almost always was the result of pleading guilty to a misdemeanor charge instead of the original felony charge.

Overall, nearly two-thirds of defendants entered a guilty plea at some point, with 54% pleading guilty to a felony, and 11% to a misdemeanor.

Defendants charged with a driving-related offense had the highest overall plea rate (83%) and the highest felony plea rate (71%) (figure 15). A majority of the defendants in each offense category except murder (41%) and assault (50%) eventually pleaded guilty to either a felony or a misdemeanor.

A majority of the defendants charged with motor vehicle theft (65%), burglary (63%), drug trafficking (60%), fraud (56%), forgery (54%), rape (53%), a weapons offense (53%), or robbery (52%) pleaded guilty to a felony. About two-fifths of murder (41%) and assault (38%) defendants entered a felony guilty plea.

An estimated 85% of all trials ended with a guilty verdict, and 15% with an acquittal. Bench trials (88%) were somewhat more likely to result in a conviction than jury trials (80%). Seventy-nine percent of bench trials and 71% of jury trials resulted in a felony conviction.

Among defendants originally charged with a property offense and later convicted, the percentages whose conviction offense corresponded with their most serious arrest charge were as follows: motor vehicle theft (82%), burglary (69%), forgery (67%), fraud (67%), and larceny/theft (66%) (table 27).

The conviction offense corresponded with the most serious arrest charge for 80% of defendants convicted after being charged with a driving-related offense, 78% of weapons defendants, and 73% of drug trafficking defendants.

For most offenses a smaller percentage of defendants were in each felony conviction category than were in the original distribution by arrest charge (tables 1 and 28). The biggest drop was in the violent felony category, which accounted for about 24% of all defendants by arrest charge, but 15% by conviction charge.

Much of this change can be accounted for by the fact that about 13% of all defendants were originally facing felony assault charges, but just 7% of all convictions were for such an offense. Overall, 16% of convicted defendants were convicted at the misdemeanor level.

A majority of the defendants whose most serious arrest charge was for a driving-related offense (69%), motor vehicle theft (60%), murder (60%), drug trafficking (55%), a weapons offense (52%), burglary (52%), or forgery (51%) were eventually convicted of that same offense (figure 17). This was true for slightly less than half of the defendants originally charged with fraud (47%), larceny/theft (46%), or robbery (43%). Thirty-seven percent of defendants charged with rape and 33% of defendants charged with felony assault were eventually convicted of the same offense.

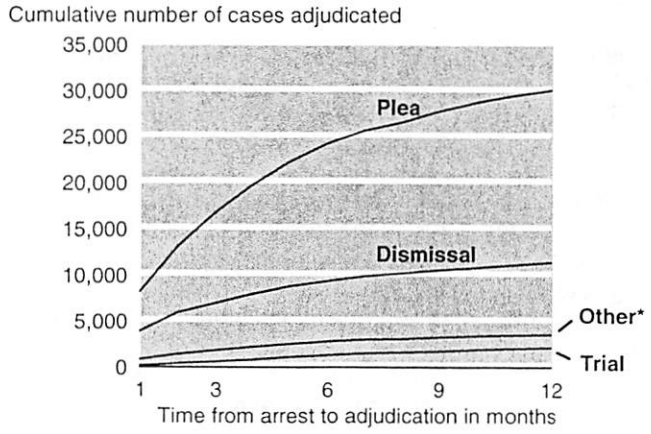
Case processing statistics

Among the approximately 47,000 cases with a known adjudication date and outcome that occurred within 1 year of arrest, about 30,000 were disposed by a guilty plea (figure 18). About a fourth of pleas occurred within 1 month of arrest and more than half within 3 months of arrest.



The next most common type of adjudication, dismissal of the charges against the defendant, occurred in about 11,400 cases. About one-third (34%) of all dismissals occurred within the first month after arrest and 61% within 3 months.

Trials occurred in about 2,100 cases. About 8% of trials were completed within a month of arrest and 25% within 3 months of arrest.

Guilty pleas accounted for 95% of the estimated 31,772 convictions obtained within 1 year of arrest (figure 19). This included about 25,400 felony pleas and about 4,600 misdemeanor pleas. Twenty-seven percent of the felony pleas occurred within 1 month of arrest, and 55% were obtained within 3 months of arrest. Twenty-eight percent of the misdemeanor pleas were obtained within 1 month of arrest, and 58% within 3 months.

Of the approximately 1,700 trial convictions obtained within 1 year, nearly all were for a felony, with an estimated 181 trials resulting in a misdemeanor conviction. About a third of all trial convictions occurred within 3 months of arrest, and nearly three-fifths within 6 months of arrest.

Time from conviction to sentencing

About 2 in 3 convicted defendants were sentenced within 1 day of adjudication (table 29). Defendants convicted of a misdemeanor (82%) were more likely to be sentenced this quickly than those convicted of a felony (62%).

Sentencing after a felony conviction occurred within 1 day in 68% of the cases where the conviction was for a drug offense. Sixty percent of the defendants convicted of property and public-order offenses, and 53% of those convicted of a violent offense were sentenced this quickly.

By specific conviction offense, less than half of defendants convicted of rape (42%) or murder (48%) were sentenced within 1 day of conviction. A majority of the defendants convicted of other felonies were sentenced within a day, including 77% of those convicted of drug offenses other than trafficking. Eighty-two percent of defendants convicted of a misdemeanor were sentenced this quickly.

Seventy-six percent of defendants convicted of a felony received their sentence within 30 days, as did 86% of those convicted of a misdemeanor. Ninety percent of defendants convicted of a felony and 92% of those convicted of a misdemeanor were sentenced within 60 days.

Type and length of sentence

Seventy-two percent of convicted defendants were sentenced to incarceration in a State prison or local jail (table 30). Seventy-five percent of defendants convicted of a felony were sentenced to incarceration, compared to 60% of those convicted of a misdemeanor. About half of incarceration sentences following a felony conviction, 38% of felony sentences overall, were to State prison.

Nearly all convictions for murder (95%) resulted in a prison sentence, as did a majority of robbery (73%), and rape (64%) convictions. Over two-fifths of defendants convicted of burglary (48%) and motor vehicle theft (43%) were sentenced to prison. Nearly two-fifths of defendants convicted of a driving related offense (39%), burglary (38%), or drug trafficking (37%) received a prison sentence. About a third of defendants convicted of forgery (35%), larceny/theft (33%), and weapons offenses (32%) were sentenced to prison.

Nearly all incarceration sentences for misdemeanor convictions, 58% of all misdemeanor sentences, were to jail.

Among defendants who were convicted but not sentenced to incarceration, 96% of those convicted of a felony and 64% of those convicted of a misdemeanor received a probation term. Probation sentences may have included a fine, restitution, community service, treatment, or other conditions.

Overall, 25% of convicted defendants received a sentence to probation without any incarceration. This included 24% of those convicted of a felony and 26% of those convicted of a misdemeanor. About two-fifths of defendants convicted of fraud (37%) or drug offenses other than trafficking (42%) were sentenced to probation without incarceration.

Overall, 3% of convicted defendants were not sentenced to a term of incarceration or probation but received a sentence that included fines, community service, treatment, or other court-ordered conditions. This included 14% of those convicted of a misdemeanor. These conditions are included in an "other" sentence category.

Among persons arrested and charged with a felony by the prosecutor, murder defendants (69%) had the highest probability of eventually being convicted and sentenced to prison (figure 20). This was about twice the probability for defendants charged with robbery (38%) or rape (32%). Twenty-nine percent of defendants originally charged with burglary, motor vehicle theft, or a driving-related offense were eventually convicted and sentenced to prison. An estimated 1 in 4 drug trafficking defendants were convicted and sentenced to prison. Defendants originally charged with fraud (11%) were the least likely to eventually be sentenced to prison.

Defendants originally charged with a driving-related offense (41%) were the most likely to be eventually convicted and receive a jail sentence. About a third of defendants charged with burglary (34%), motor vehicle theft (33%), a weapons offense (32%), or forgery (31%) were convicted and sentenced to jail.

A majority of defendants originally charged with murder (76%), a driving-related offense (69%), burglary (63%), motor vehicle theft (62%), robbery (56%), or drug trafficking (54%) were eventually convicted and sentenced to either prison or jail. This was the case for about half of rape or forgery defendants.

About 2 in 5 defendants originally charged with assault (41%) or fraud (39%) were eventually convicted and sentenced to incarceration.

Among defendants convicted of a felony and sentenced to prison, the mean sentence was 63 months and the median was 32 months (table 31). By general conviction offense category, defendants convicted of a violent felony received the longest prison sentences (a mean of 135 months and a median of 60 months), and those convicted of a public-order felony the shortest (a mean of 34 months and a median of 24 months).

By specific conviction offense, murderers received the longest prison terms, a mean of 510 months and a median of 480 months. Next were defendants convicted of rape with a mean prison sentence of 201 months, and a median of 120 months.

Median prison sentences for other felony convictions included 72 months for robbery, 48 months for assault, and 36 months for burglary or drug trafficking (figure 21).

Thirty-eight percent of all murder convictions resulted in a life sentence, compared to 10% of rape defendants and a maximum of 1% of the defendants convicted of any other offense.

In addition to those receiving life sentences, 49% of the defendants convicted of murder were sentenced to more than 10 years in prison. Defendants convicted of rape (27%) or robbery (25%) were the next most likely to receive a prison term this long.

For defendants convicted of a felony and subsequently sentenced to jail, the mean jail term was 6 months and the median was 5 months (table 32). Misdemeanor convictions resulted in a mean jail term of 5 months and a median of 3 months.

Excluding murder and rape (for which few convictions resulted in a jail sentence), defendants sentenced to jail for robbery received the longest average sentence (a mean of 11 months and a median of 12 months).

An estimated 62% of felony jail sentences were for a period of greater than 3 months. Jail sentences following convictions for violent felonies (72%) were more likely to be for more than 3 months than those for property (63%), drug (59%), or public-order (53%) felonies.

Forty-six percent of jail sentences following misdemeanor convictions were for more than 3 months.

For defendants sentenced to probation without incarceration for a felony, the median sentence length was 36 months, compared to 12 months for a misdemeanor (table 33). Three percent of defendants convicted of a felony were given a probation term of greater than 5 years, including 7% of those sentenced for a violent felony.

Some probation sentences were supplemented by one or more special court-ordered conditions. For example, 16% of the defendants who received a probation sentence were required to perform a specified number of hours of community service work (table 34).

Thirteen percent of offenders sentenced to probation were required to pay restitution, including 32% of those convicted for a property-related felony. Twenty-eight percent of probation sentences included a requirement that the defendant enter a treatment program, including 49% of those convicted for drug offenses.

Prior record and felony sentencing

For defendants convicted of a felony on their current charge, the probability of receiving a sentence to incarceration was highest if they had multiple prior felony convictions (85%) (table 35). Seventy-five percent of defendants with just one prior felony conviction and 70% of those with only prior misdemeanor convictions were also sentenced to incarceration following a felony conviction in the current case.

Overall, defendants with no prior convictions of any type (65%) were the least likely to receive a sentence to incarceration for a felony conviction, although 81% of them received such a sentence when the conviction was for a violent felony.

Defendants with no prior felony convictions and whose current conviction was for a drug offense were the least likely among defendants convicted of a felony to be sentenced to incarceration.

Fifty-eight percent of the defendants with more than one prior felony conviction were sentenced to prison for a new felony conviction. This included 75% of those whose current conviction was for a violent felony.

Forty-one percent of the defendants with a single prior felony conviction were sentenced to prison following a felony conviction in the current case, including a majority of those convicted of a violent felony (56%).

Overall, nearly a fourth of defendants without a prior felony conviction received a prison sentence for a felony conviction in the current case. However, about two-fifths of such defendants received a prison sentence when the current conviction was for a violent felony.

A majority of property (58%) and public-order (51%) offenders with a prior conviction record consisting solely of misdemeanors received a jail sentence.

About 2 in 5 drug offenders with a prior conviction record consisting solely of misdemeanors (45%) or with no prior convictions of any kind (40%) received a probation sentence.

Note: Data on prior conviction record and type of sentence were available for 92% of all convicted defendants. Sentences to incarceration may have also included a probation term. Sentences to incarceration or probation may have included a fine, restitution, community service, treatment, or other court-ordered conditions. Other sentences may include fines, community service, restitution, and treatment.
Detail may not add to total because of rounding.
--Less than 0.5%.

Defendants convicted of a violent felony were much more likely to be sentenced to prison than jail or probation if they had at least one prior felony conviction (figure 22). Incarceration was also likely for those without prior felony convictions, with jail and prison having similar probabilities.

Among defendants convicted of a nonviolent felony, a prison sentence was only slightly more likely than a jail sentence for those with one prior felony conviction, but much more likely if they had multiple prior felony convictions. For those with a prior conviction record that consisted of only misdemeanors, jail was the most probable sentence. Probation and jail sentences had similar probabilities of being used if the defendant had no prior convictions of any type.

Methodology

The SCPS sample was designed and selected by U.S. Census Bureau staff. It is a 2-stage stratified sample, with 40 of the 75 most populous counties selected at stage one and a systematic sample of State court felony filings (defendants) within each county selected at stage two. The 40 counties were divided into 4 first-stage strata based on court filing information. Ten counties were included in the sample with certainty because of their large number of court filings. The remaining counties were allocated to the three noncertainty strata based on the variance of felony court dispositions.

SCPS first-stage design

	Number of counties
Stratum	Sample	Universe	Weight
One	10	10	1.00
Two	10	18	1.80
Three	10	22	2.20
Four	10	25	2.50

The second-stage sampling (filings) was designed to represent all defendants who had felony cases filed with the court during the month of May 2002. The participating jurisdictions provided data for every felony case filed on selected days during that month. Depending on the first-stage stratum in which it had been placed, each jurisdiction provided filings data for 5, 10, or 20 randomly selected business days in May 2002. Data from jurisdictions that were not required to provide a full month of filings were weighted to represent the full month (see Appendix table A).

SCPS second-stage design

Stratum	Number of days of filings provided	Weight
One	5	4.0
Two	10	2.0
Four	20	1.0

The 2002 SCPS collected data for 15,358 felony cases filed during May 2002 in 40 large counties. These cases, which were tracked for up to 1 year, were part of a sample that was representative of the estimated 56,146 felony cases filed in the Nation's 75 most populous counties during that month. Ninety-three cases (weighted) were omitted from analysis because they could not be classified into one of the four major crime categories (violent, property, drug, public order).

This report is based on data collected from the following counties: Alabama (Jefferson); Arizona (Maricopa, Pima); California (Alameda, Contra Costa, Los Angeles, Orange, Riverside, San Bernardino, San Diego, San Mateo, Santa Clara); Florida (Broward, Miami-Dade, Palm Beach, Pinellas); Georgia (Fulton); Hawaii (Honolulu); Illinois (Cook); Indiana (Marion); Maryland (Baltimore, Montgomery); Michigan (Macomb, Wayne); New Jersey (Essex); New York (Bronx, Kings, Nassau, Westchester); Ohio (Franklin); Pennsylvania (Montgomery, Philadelphia); Tennessee (Shelby); Texas (Dallas, El Paso, Harris, Tarrant, Travis); Utah (Salt Lake City); Virginia (Fairfax).

Because the data came from a sample, a sampling error is associated with each reported number. In general, if the difference between two numbers is greater than twice the standard error for that difference, we can say that we are 95% confident of a real difference and that the apparent difference is not simply the result of using a sample rather than the entire population.

Offense categories

Felony offenses were classified into 18 categories for this report. These were further classified into the four major crime categories of violent, property, drug, and public-order. The following listings are a representative summary of the crimes in each category; however, these lists are not meant to be exhaustive. All offenses, except for murder, include attempts and conspiracies to commit.

Violent offenses

Murder — Includes homicide, nonnegligent manslaughter, and voluntary homicide. Excludes attempted murder (classified as felony assault), negligent homicide, involuntary homicide, or vehicular manslaughter, which are classified as other violent offenses.

Rape — Includes forcible intercourse, sodomy, or penetration with a foreign object. Does not include statutory rape or nonforcible acts with a minor or someone unable to give legal consent, nonviolent sexual offenses, or commercialized sex offenses.

Robbery — Includes unlawful taking of anything of value by force or threat of force. Includes armed, unarmed, and aggravated robbery, car-jacking, armed burglary, and armed mugging.

Assault — Includes aggravated assault, aggravated battery, attempted murder, assault with a deadly weapon, felony assault or battery on a law enforcement officer, and other felony assaults. Does not include extortion, coercion, or intimidation.

Other violent offenses — Includes vehicular manslaughter, involuntary manslaughter, negligent or reckless homicide, nonviolent or non-forcible sexual assault, kidnapping, unlawful imprisonment, child or spouse abuse, cruelty to a child, reckless endangerment, hit-and-run with bodily injury, intimidation, and extortion.

Property offenses

Burglary — Includes any type of entry into a residence, industry, or business with or without the use of force with the intent to commit a felony or theft. Does not include possession of burglary tools, trespassing, or unlawful entry for which the intent is not known.

Larceny/theft — Includes grand theft, grand larceny, and any other felony theft, including burglary from an automobile, theft of rental property, and mail theft. Does not include motor vehicle theft, receiving or buying stolen property, fraud, forgery, or deceit.

Motor vehicle theft — Includes auto theft, conversion of an automobile, receiving and transferring an automobile, unauthorized use of a vehicle, possession of a stolen vehicle, larceny or taking of an automobile.

Forgery — Includes forging of a driver's license, official seals, notes, money orders, credit or access cards or names of such cards or any other documents with fraudulent intent, uttering a forged instrument, counterfeiting, forgery.

Fraud — Includes possession and passing of worthless checks or money orders, possession of false documents or identification, embezzlement, obtaining money by false pretenses, credit card fraud, welfare fraud, Medicare fraud, insurance claim fraud, fraud, swindling, stealing a thing of value by deceit, larceny by check.

Other property offenses — Includes receiving or buying stolen property, arson, reckless burning, damage to property, criminal mischief, vandalism, criminal trespassing, possession of burglary tools, and unlawful entry for which the interest is unknown.

Drug offenses

Drug trafficking — Includes trafficking, sales, distribution, possession with intent to distribute or sell, manufacturing, and smuggling of controlled substances. Does not include possession of controlled substances.

Other drug offenses — Includes possession of controlled substances, prescription violations, possession of drug paraphernalia, and other drug law violations.

Public-order offenses

Weapons — Includes the unlawful sale, distribution, manufacture, alteration, transportation, possession, or use of a deadly weapon or accessory.

Driving-related — Includes driving under the influence of drugs or alcohol, driving with a suspended or revoked license, and any other felony in the motor vehicle code.

Other public-order offenses — Includes flight/escape, parole or probation violations, prison contraband, habitual offender, obstruction of justice, rioting, libel, slander, treason, perjury, prostitution, pandering, bribery, and tax law violations.

Terms related to pretrial release

Released defendant — Includes any defendant who was released from custody prior to the disposition of his or her case by the court. Includes defendants who were detained for some period of time before being released and defendants who were returned to custody after being released because of a violation of the conditions of pretrial release. The terms "on pretrial release" and "released pending disposition" are both used in this report to refer to all released defendants.

Detained defendant — Includes any defendant who remained in custody from the time of arrest until the disposition of his or her case by the court. This report also refers to detained defendants as "not released."

Failure to appear — Occurs when a court issues a bench warrant for a defendant's arrest because he or she missed a scheduled court appearance.

Types of financial release

Surety bond — A bail bond company signs a promissory note to the court for the full bail amount and charges the defendant a fee for the service (usually 10% of the full bail amount). If the defendant fails to appear, the bond company is liable to the court for the full bail amount. Frequently the bond company requires collateral from the defendant in addition to the fee.

Deposit bond — The defendant deposits a percentage (usually 10%) of the full bail amount with the court. The percentage of the bail is returned after the disposition of the case, but the court often retains a small portion for administrative costs. If the defendant fails to appear in court, he or she is liable to the court for the full bail amount.

Full cash bond — The defendant posts the full bail amount in cash with the court. If the defendant makes all court appearances, the cash is returned. If the defendant fails to appear in court, the bond is forfeited.

Property bond — Involves an agreement made by a defendant as a condition of pretrial release requiring that property valued at the full bail amount be posted as an assurance of his or her appearance in court. If the defendant fails to appear in court, the property is forfeited. Also known as "collateral bond."

Types of nonfinancial release

Release on recognizance (ROR) — The court releases the defendant on a signed agreement that he or she will appear in court as required. In this report, the ROR category includes citation releases in which arrestees are released pending their first court appearance on a written order issued by law enforcement or jail personnel.

Unsecured bond — The defendant pays no money to the court but is liable for the full amount of bail should he or she fail to appear in court.

Conditional release — Defendants are released under specified conditions. Monitoring or supervision, if required, is usually done by a pretrial services agency. In some cases, such as those involving a third-party custodian or drug monitoring and treatment, another agency may be involved in the supervision of the defendant. Conditional release sometimes includes an unsecured bond.

Other type of release

Emergency release — Defendants are released in response to a court order placing limits on a jail's population.

Note: In some of the 40 counties included in the 2002 SCPS study, prosecutors did not screen out any felony arrests before filing charges. In these counties, the SCPS sample cases are representative of all felony cases received by prosecutors and any cases subsequently screened out by the prosecutor are included in the SCPS dismissal category. In other counties, all felony arrests were reviewed by prosecutors before the decision to file felony charges was made. In these jurisdictions, the SCPS sample cases do not include those in which a person was arrested for a felony but felony charges were not filed. Weights are rounded to the second decimal place. Populations are Census Bureau figures for July 1, 2002.

December 15, 2005

Dear Ladies/Gentlemen:

I want to express my appreciation for the time each of you devoted to our meeting this past Tuesday. The issue of in-court cameras is not only very important to Court TV, but also, we believe, to the American public, as attested to by the overwhelming number of states which now permit cameras in their courtrooms.

In this connection, I thought each of you might be interested in the enclosed material, which Court TV distributes to judges in order to help them become familiar with the process, and set up, when camera access to a trial is granted.

Of course, if there is any further information I can furnish, I would be delighted to do so, and, once again, I thank you for your time and hospitality.

Sincerely,

Douglas P. Jacobs

CAMERAS IN THE COURTROOM: THE LESSONS OF EXPERIENCE

"The life of the law has not been logic: It has been experience."

Oliver Wendell Holmes Jr.

Court TV has televised more than 850 trials since its beginning in 1991. The vast majority of participants at all levels in these trials have reported that their experience with cameras was positive. The apprehensions of some judges and lawyers about televising trials are simply not borne out by the data.

IN COURT TV'S YEARS OF TELEVISING JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS:

- No verdict has ever been overturned or even challenged because of the presence of cameras. We believe that there has not been a single instance in the last 25 years in which television coverage has resulted in a case being overturned.

- Television cameras do not disrupt the proceedings. As one California judge wrote us: "After the first five minutes we didn't even notice the camera in the courtroom."

- Judges who permit cameras in their courtrooms often allow cameras to return for subsequent cases. A judge from Oregon noted, "This is the second time I've had the good fortune to work with Court TV, and both have been very, very positive experiences."

- Full television coverage of trials usually increases respect for the judiciary. From a San Diego judge, "Based on mail and phone calls, I think many people learned more of the criminal justice system in this manner."

- Opening trials to television cameras better informs the public about the judicial system. More than 80 percent of Americans derive most of their news from television.

- Televised trials illuminate important issues. Racial problems, drug abuse, child neglect, mental health, domestic violence, gun control, drunk driving, and many other societal concerns are explored during court proceedings.

"Thank you for the professional presentation on Court TV. . . . It was a pleasure to have you in our Court, and I appreciate the manner in which you conducted the taping of the trial."

J. Randall Wyatt, Jr., Judge, Criminal Court, Division II, Nashville, Tennessee

"We also thank you and your colleagues for the professional and dignified manner in which you conducted yourselves during the trial."

Deborah G. Tyner, Circuit Judge for the Sixth Judicial Circuit of Michigan

"Having cameras in the courtroom was a great experience. I will spread the word to all my colleagues."

The Case for TV

By Henry Schleiff

Both Kobe Bryant and Scott Peterson face not only serious criminal charges but also an onslaught of publicity. In the case of Mr. Bryant, the basketball star charged with sexual assault, so far cameras have been allowed in the courtroom. In the case of Mr. Peterson, charged with murdering his pregnant wife, the judge has closed next month's preliminary hearing to cameras.

Justice televised is justice improved (most of the time).

Trials and most judicial proceedings are meant to be public, of course, and cameras make it possible for more citizens to see them. But there are limits. If a judge determines that cameras would be inappropriate in a particular case, that decision should not be subject to appeal. The judge presides over the courtroom, and he or she must have the ultimate discretion to determine what is in the public interest — even if that decision goes against the interests of the electronic media.

That said, cameras should be routinely permitted in the courtroom, as are reporters for the print media. A judge should have to explain the reasoning for imposing a ban. At present, all 50 states allow cameras in some courts. Thirty-eight allow them in criminal courts. The federal government permits them only in certain appellate courts, but there is a growing consensus that having cameras in courtrooms serves the public interest.

Under no circumstances, however, should cameras be allowed in the jury room. Given the variety and popularity of reality TV today, I can easily envision a midseason replacement series on one of the networks called "Live From the Jury Room." Such a series might be good for Nielsen ratings, but it would be bad for our system of justice.

That's because jury deliberations are meant to be private. Juries must be free to make independent judgments of guilt or innocence, free from having to explain the evolution of their thinking, and free from concerns that their discussions could expose them to threats — or worse — from those who disagree with them.

The camera should be used to make more accessible those elements of government that are truly meant to be public, like trials, not to invade those elements that are properly private, like jury deliberations. The beauty of the camera is that it can expand the courtroom and enable the public to freely observe the functioning of the judicial branch of government, as was intended by the founders. □

Henry Schleiff is chairman and chief executive of Court TV.

The Dallas Morning News Monday, March 1, 2004

Television should catch messiness, as well as majesty, of trials

Imagine the public uproar if Congress decided not to allow TV coverage of the president's State of the Union speech. What if the barons of the Senate and House decided the president's address would become less political and more substantive if the legislators alone were allowed to hear it? The public would get its information from the opposing spin doctors who always hold forth on television before and after the speech.

Unthinkable? Not in some of the nation's trial courts, where a few judges are adopting a similarly bad idea. They are decreeing that television will be permitted to broadcast only the lawyers' opening statements and closing arguments plus the jury's verdict – and none of the testimony in between.

Fred Graham

It is a disturbing trend because the public is being denied the right to see what its government is doing. Instead, the people are being relegated to the spin of the advocates, a sort of "Justice Lite" that implies they are being permitted to see the judicial system in operation on television, when in reality they aren't. Some judges are being less than straightforward by giving the impression they are upholding the voting public's desire to see trials on television, when viewers aren't being permitted to see the essence of every trial, the testimony.

This judicial sleight of hand can boomerang against the justice system, as it did in the recent trial of multimillionaire Robert Durst in Galveston. He admitted shooting a neighbor and throwing the chopped-up body into Galveston Bay, but he said he acted in self-defense. Mr. Durst was acquitted, and because the public had been permitted to see only the lawyers' arguments and none of the testimony on television, Texas justice was ridiculed as clueless by people around the world.

A similar public misunderstanding grew out of the 2002 trial of a San Francisco couple whose dog mauled a neighbor to death. Because TV viewers had been exposed to only the lawyers' spin and not the testimony, the public didn't learn about the callous insensitivity of the dog owners, and there was wide public criticism when the defendants were sentenced to long prison terms.

Thankfully, the judicial trend toward "Justice Lite" has been confined largely to Texas and California. There are obvious – though not uplifting – reasons for that.

Texas is the only state in which the state Supreme Court has failed to decide whether TV cameras will be allowed in criminal trials and, if so, what the rules will be. Each trial judge is left to invent his own rules for dealing with broadcasters asking for camera access and with the defendant's lawyer, who generally is seeking as little exposure as possible. A growing number of Texas judges are "splitting the baby" by allowing the public to see the legal arguments but not the evidence. The best antidote to that would be for the Texas Supreme Court to issue a rule requiring judges to admit cameras to all portions of trials unless there has been a showing that some specific harm will result.

The problem in California grows out of a schizophrenic judicial reaction to the unruly O.J. Simpson trial, which was televised and widely considered a disaster for the judicial system. On the one hand, an increasing number of trial judges seem to have become fearful that if they permit cameras in their courtrooms, an unseemly Simpson-type proceeding may be shown to the world. On the other hand, the California Judicial Council reviewed the camera issue in the wake of the Simpson case and gave its blessing to the value of television in courts. It concluded that TV coverage of trials should continue, except in unusual circumstances, as a way of "maintaining public trust and confidence in the judicial system" and "promoting public access to the judicial system."

Increasingly, California judges are responding to those conflicting considerations by adopting "Justice Lite" – allowing TV coverage of the lawyers' orations but excluding cameras from the more free-wheeling testimony of witnesses, when justice can appear messy and a judge who fails to control the courtroom can look inept. At a time when more than 80 percent of Americans are getting most of their information from television, that is thin gruel indeed.

The fact is that no trial in the United States has been overturned in more than 40 years because a TV camera was in the court. Yet last month, the Los Angeles judge presiding over the murder trial of actor Robert Blake decreed that cameras will be allowed only during the attorneys' opening and closing remarks, not the testimony, in order to "protect the defendant's right to a fair trial." When Mr. Blake's lawyer attempted to rise to say his client wanted the trial to be televised, the judge cut him off.

RESULTS OF JUDICIAL QUESTIONNAIRE (1991-1993) PREPARED FOR THE COURTROOM TELEVISION NETWORK (COURT TV)

Since its launch on July 1, 1991 Court TV has covered 229 civil and criminal trials in 28 states, in both federal and state courts. A brief, two-page survey regarding Court TV's presence and the conduct of its staff in their courtrooms was mailed to the 180 judges who presided over those cases.

On July 19, 1993 we prepared a master tally of the questionnaires returned by the 130 judges who responded. The results include responses from 19 federal judges (of the 23) who presided over cases covered by Court TV during the first two years of the U.S. experiment with cameras in federal civil trials.

The principal finding of the survey is that the presence of Court TV's cameras in courtrooms has not impeded the judicial process according to the unanimous opinion of the 129* judges who responded to this question. In fact, this was a strongly held view of many judges, as evidenced by the comment of a Wisconsin judge, "I am completely satisfied that the presence of Court TV did not affect the trial in any material manner, and certainly did not affect the manner in which the jury performed its important function." A number of respondents referred to the cameras as "unobtrusive" and several remarked they "forgot the camera was there." A Michigan judge echoed a frequent comment when he wrote "Everyone got use to them quickly, eventually they were hardly noticed."

Eighty-five judges (65%) thought the presence of Court TV's cameras, and its reporting, "Helped convey the events of the trial in a way that contributed to public understanding of the legal system." The remaining judges indicated they were "not sure" about the educational impact of Court TV's coverage or declined to answer the question, citing lack of access to the network's telecasts as the reason for these responses.

* One judge declined to answer the question, writing instead that the matter was "under study."

DOJ_NMG_0142375

Nearly all respondents (97%) found that Court TV's personnel were courteous, were respectful of the court process, and were dressed appropriately.

Below are some random comments from both state and federal judges about Court TV and its operation in the courtroom.

"I believe the public scrutiny adds to the fairness of the proceeding and assures the even handed administration of justice."

State Court of Fulton County (GA)

"You have covered three trials in my session. My experience with Court TV has been excellent to outstanding in every way. In the past, the public only saw 30-second bites of trials. With Court TV the public sees and feels what the entire trial is about. The courts belong to the public, and the public has the right to see what we do."

Middlesex County Superior Court (MA)

"It was a pleasure working with your people, and I think it's great that the public are getting to see the real world of courtrooms -- a far cry from P. Mason and L.A. Law."

United States District Court
Eastern District of Pennsylvania

"The personnel conducted themselves in an exemplary manner."

New York City Civil Court (NY)

"You were extremely professional and courteous. You should be commended for the service."

Maricopa County Superior Court (AZ)

"Based on mail and phone calls I think many people learned more of the criminal justice system in this manner."

San Diego Superior Court (CA)

"I was worried that court personnel would "play" to the camera. This did not happen. After 30 minutes everyone forgot the camera's were there."

Third Judicial Circuit for Dixie County (FL)

"Anything which reveals that we do, in a reasonably complete way, is of benefit to the public and, therefore, the Court.

New York Supreme Court (NY)

"Overall it was a very positive experience in a very high profile trial. Your staff was very respectful and unquestionably objective in their presentation. They were quite courteous."

Circuit Court Criminal Division, Broward County (FL)

"Unlike local tv which tends to come and go during the course of the trial, the continued presence of the Court TV camera had a beneficial effect. It brought a sense of dignity to the proceedings. Unfortunately, the local tv news emphasis encourages the attorneys to act out for a sound bite. Your organization does not do that."

District Court (VT)

"If anything, the broader public scrutiny causes all parties to adhere more closely to the dictates of the law and the rules of professional conduct."

Los Angeles Superior Court (CA)

"In a very short period of time, we all ceased to be aware of their presence (even those of us with acting aspirations). From the comments that I have received, the full presentation of the trial, rather that the usual bit reporting of the normal news report, gave the results uncontroversial authenticity."

Hamilton County Court of Common Pleas (OH)

"All personnel were most courteous and willing to cooperate in any way. Exceptional rapport and understanding of the process."

Wake County Superior Court (NC)

"Televising the entire trial duplicates and expands the right of the public to attend trials."

Pasadena Superior Court (CA)

"It permitted the public as a whole to see all the testimony and evidence; not just a summary. This permits a better understanding of jury verdicts."

Richland County Circuit Court (SC)

"The camera was not intrusive. Having it there I think kept everyone on their toes."

Los Angeles Municipal Court (CA)

ATTORNEY GENERAL ALBERTO R. GONZALES DELIVERS REMARKS REGARDING THE WAR ON TERROR AT THE COUNCIL ON FOREIGN RELATIONS

Progress in the War on Terrorism

The prevention of terrorist attacks and the prosecution of the war on terrorism remain the top priorities of the Department of Justice. In the past year alone, there have been significant convictions in terrorism cases from Virginia to Texas, following a track record of success over the past four years in previous cases such as John Walker Lindh, Zacarias Moussaoui and Richard Reid, among others.

Notable cases resolved in 2005 include:

Ahmed Omar Abu Ali: On November 22, 2005 in the Eastern District of Virginia, a federal jury convicted Ahmed Omar Abu Ali on all counts of a superseding indictment charging him with terrorism offenses. The jury found Ali, a 24-year-old Virginia man, guilty of conspiracy to provide material support and resources to a designated foreign terrorist organization (al Qaeda); providing material support and resources to al Qaeda; conspiracy to provide material support to terrorists; providing material support to terrorists; contribution of services to al Qaeda; receipt of funds and services from al Qaeda; conspiracy to assassinate the President of the United States; conspiracy to commit air piracy; and conspiracy to destroy aircraft. Ali faces a mandatory minimum sentence of 20 years in prison and a maximum sentence of life in prison. Sentencing is scheduled for February 17, 2006.

Uzair Paracha: On November 23, 2005, a federal jury in the Southern District of New York convicted Uzair Paracha, a Pakistani national with permanent resident alien status in the United States, on charges of providing material support to al Qaeda. Evidence at trial proved that Paracha agreed with his father and two al Qaeda members to provide support to al Qaeda by, among other things, trying to help an al Qaeda member re-enter the United States to commit a terrorist act. Paracha faces a maximum sentence of 75 years in prison. Sentencing is scheduled for March 3, 2006.

Hemant Lakhani: On April 27, 2005 in the District of New Jersey, a federal jury convicted a British national, Hemant Lakhani, on charges of attempting to sell shoulder-fired missiles to what he thought was a terrorist group intent on shooting down U.S. airliners. Lakhani was arrested following an undercover sting operation involving agents from several nations. Lakhani was sentenced in September 2005 to 47 years in prison.

Ali Al-Timimi: On April 26, 2005 in the Eastern District of Virginia, Ali Al-Timimi was convicted on all 10 charges brought against him in connection with the "Virginia Jihad" case. Al-Timimi, a spiritual leader at a mosque in Northern Virginia, encouraged other individuals at a meeting to go to Pakistan to receive military training from Lashkar-e-Taibi, a designated foreign terrorist group, in order to fight U.S. troops in Afghanistan. Al-Timimi was sentenced to life in prison.

Zacarias Moussaoui: On April 24, 2005 in the Eastern District of Virginia, Zacarias Moussaoui pleaded guilty to six charges against him related to his participation in the September 11th conspiracy. Moussaoui faces a maximum penalty of death.

Eric Robert Rudolph: On April 13, 2005 in the Northern District of Georgia and the Northern District of Alabama, Eric Robert Rudolph pleaded guilty to charges related to deadly bombings in Birmingham, Alabama, and in the Atlanta area, including the bombing at the 1996 Olympics. He has been sentenced to life in prison. Rudolph provided the government with information about 250 pounds of explosives that he had hidden in the Western North Carolina area. As a result of Rudolph's information, the government was able to locate and safely detonate the explosives.

'INFOCOM': On April 12, 2005 in the Northern District of Texas, a federal jury convicted Bayan Elashi, Basman Elashi, Ghassan Elashi and the Infocom Corporation on charges of conspiracy to deal in the property of a specially designated terrorist and money laundering. The activities were related to Infocom, an Internet service provider believed to be a front for Hamas.

Mohammed Ali Hasan Al-Moayad and Mohammed Zayed: On March 10, 2005 a federal jury in the Eastern District of New York convicted Mohammed Ali Hasan Al-Moayad, a Yemeni cleric, and Mohammed Zayed on charges of providing, and conspiring to provide material support and resources to al Qaeda and Hamas. Al-Moayad was sentenced to 75 years in prison; Zayed was sentenced to 45 years in prison.

Rafil Dhafir: On February 10, 2005 in the Northern District of New York, a federal jury convicted Rafil Dhafir on charges of participating in a conspiracy to unlawfully send money to Iraq, in violation of U.S. sanctions, and money laundering. Dhafir was sentenced to 22 years in prison.

Lynne Stewart, et al: On February 10, 2005, a federal jury in the Southern District of New York convicted attorney Lynne Stewart, Mohammed Yousry, Ahmed Abdel Sattar and Yassir al-Sirri on charges including providing, and concealing the provision of, material support or resources to terrorists. The four defendants were associates of Sheikh Abdel-Rahman, leader of the terrorist organization Islamic Group (IG). Rahman is serving a life sentence for his role in terrorist activity, including the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center.

SUBJECT: TODAY'S BRIEFING

DATE: THURSDAY, DECEMBER 1, 2005

OFF THE WIRES:

- Consumer Spending, Personal Income Rise For October. The Department of Commerce reported this morning that consumer spending rose 0.2 percent in October, in line with economists' expectations, while personal income rose 0.4 percent, slightly below the 0.5 percent expected. The price index for personal consumption, which excludes food and energy costs and is closely watched at the fed, rose 0.1 percent in October, down from a 0.2 percent rise in September. October's year-over-year growth was 1.8 percent, compared to 2.0 percent for September.

- ISM Manufacturing Index Down Slightly, But Still Registering Growth. The Institute For Supply Management's Manufacturing Index came in at 58.1 in November, down from a 59.1 reading in October. Any reading about 50 indicates an expansion of the manufacturing sector and November's reading is the 30th consecutive month of expansion. Norbert Ore, chair of the Index's survey committee, said, "The New Orders and Production indexes continue to drive the sector. While energy costs and supply interruptions remain a concern, purchasers are satisfied in general with current business conditions."

- Jobless Claims Drop. The Department Of Labor reported this morning that first-time claims for US jobless benefits dropped 17,000 last week to 320,000, in line with Wall Street's expectations. The four-week moving average fell 1,250 to 322,500.

- Rise In Home Prices Slows. The average cost of a single family home rose 12 percent the twelve months ending September 30, the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight. The previous reading, for the twelve months ending June 30, showed a 14 percent rise in average home prices.

IN THE WHITE HOUSE AND AROUND TOWN:

- White House Investigates Reports Military Paid Iraqi Press For Favorable Stories. The White House said today it is "very concerned" about reports the US military is paying Iraqi newspapers to print favorable stories about the war and the rebuilding effort. Press Secretary Scott McClellan told reporters, "We are seeking more information from the Pentagon." McClellan said Joint Chiefs Chairman Peter Pace indicated the story "was news to him as well."

  Pace Says Military Has Done Poor Job Of Explaining War Effort. Meanwhile, Pace said today the military has done an inadequate job of explaining what is going on in Iraq and the political and military progress there. Speaking at the National Defense University at Fort McNair, Pace also said, however, that the war against terrorism will be a long one. Pace said of the suggestion the US would be better off leaving Iraq now, "There is no option other than victory. You need to get out and read what our enemies have said. ... Their goal is to destroy our way of life."

  Lynch Says US Operations On Syrian Border Resulting In Fewer Terrorist Attacks In Iraq. Gen. Mark Lynch said today US and Iraqi operations along the Syrian border have resulted in a significant decrease in suicide bombings. Lunch said there were 23 attacks in November, the lowest level in seven months. He also said that while exact figures are not available, US forces have also recorded a reduction in car bombs and roadside bombs compared with October. Lynch added that for the month there was a 34 percent reduction in overall casualties. Lynch said the main entry point for foreign fighters has been shut down, adding that at least 96 percent of suicide bombers in Iraq are from outside the country. Lynch also said US and Iraqi forces discovered 301 weapons caches in November, the largest number captured in a single month this year, and that at least 117 members of al Qaeda have been killed or captured in 2005. Lynch said Abu Musab al-Zarqawi is "struggling because we've taken away a lot of his leadership, we've taken away a lot of his munitions, he's struggling because we've denied him safe havens across Iraq."

Kerry Says Bush At Odds With Generals. Sen. John Kerry told NBC television this morning his major problem with President Bush's speech yesterday is that "it doesn't recognize the realities on the ground which his own generals, General Casey, have laid bare to the United States Congress and the American people. The fact is General Casey has said that the large presence of American troops in Iraq gives credence to the notion of occupation and, in fact, delays the willingness and the ability of the Iraqi troops to stand up. And I think until the President really acknowledges that that large presence is part of the problem and begins to set a benchmark process for transferring responsibility to the Iraqis, we're going to continue with more of the same, and I think that's the greatest problem. And the other problem is we're not doing what we ought to be doing with respect to the political reconciliation. No gun, no soldier is going to end the insurgency in Iraq. The insurgency has to be dealt with through a political reconciliation." NBC's Matt Lauer said that in his speech, Bush addressed key points Kerry made on November 10 and that "it doesn't seem that you have all that much disagreement on the big items on that list." Kerry responded, "Actually, we do have a disagreement. Number one, I want to set a target for the transfer of authority. For instance, we ought to be able to say that within the next two months or three months we're going to transfer the responsibility for the control of Baghdad to Iraqi troops, or by such and such a time it is our goal. You don't have to set a specific target that's going to be adhered to no matter what. There are obviously variations on what happens."

Guerrillas Fire On US Installations But Quickly Disperse. Guerrillas fired mortars at several US bases and government offices in Ramadi today before dispersing, residents and police said. There were no immediate reports of death or injury, and US officers said the attacks may have been little more than a propaganda stunt. The insurgents left behind posters and graffiti saying they were members of al Qaeda in Iraq and claiming responsibility for shooting down a US drone. There were no reports that such an aircraft was shot down, however.

Interior Ministry's Chief Human Rights Investigator Fired. An official speaking on condition of anonymity said Interior Minister Bayan Jabr has fired Nouri al-Nouri, the ministry's chief inspector for corruption cases and human rights violations, on orders from Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari. Details were not immediately available.

- Bush Marks World AIDS Day. President Bush marked World AIDS Day in an address at the White House this morning, saying, "Today, with people around the world, not just here in America, but all around the world, 40 million – we turn our thoughts to the more than 40 million men, women, and children who are living with HIV. That's what World AIDS Day is all about. And on World AIDS Day, we renew our commitment to turn the tide against this disease."

  Bush said that in Africa, the "pandemic threatens the stability and the future of whole societies" and in Asia, HIV/AIDS "is a challenge that grows daily and must be confronted directly." Bush added, "Here in the United States, over a million of our citizens face this chronic condition. At the start of this century, AIDS causes suffering from remote villages of Africa to the heart of America's big cities. This danger is multiplied by indifference and complacency. This danger will be overcome by compassion, honesty, and decisive action. I believe America has a unique ability, and a special calling, to fight this disease. We are blessed with great scientific knowledge. We're a generous country that has always reached out to feed the hungry, and rescue captives, and care for the sick. We are guided by the conviction of our founding -- that the Author of Life has endowed every life with matchless value." Bush said the federal government currently provides "more than $17 billion a year to help people in America living with HIV/AIDS – including funding that brings life-saving drugs and treatment to hundreds of thousands of low-income Americans." Nevertheless, Bush said, "America still sees an estimated 40,000 new infections each year. This is not inevitable – and it's not acceptable." Bush said that outside America's borders, the US continues to support the Global Fund, "which is helping nations purchase medicines and treat tuberculosis, the deadly infection that often accompanies AIDS. We are also supporting our partners through the Emergency Plan for AIDS Relief, the largest initiative in history to combat a specific disease. This effort is designed to support and strengthen the AIDS-fighting strategies of many nations, including 15 heavily afflicted nations in Africa, Asia, and the Caribbean. In May 2003, we committed $15 billion over five years to meet specific goals: to support treatment for two million people; support prevention for seven million people; support care for 10 million people."

Bush also announced today a "New Partners Initiative," under which "we will further reach out to our faith-based and community organizations that provide much of the health care in the developing world, and make sure they have access to an American assistance. By identifying and supporting these organizations, we will reach more people, more effectively, and save more lives." The President continued, "Americans have always stood for human dignity when history calls. When the nations of Europe lay in rubble after World War II, America helped build a brighter future with the Marshall Plan. When the developing world looked for help and inspiration, we sent the Peace Corps to lay new foundations for friendship. And now, as millions afflicted with AIDS reach out for help, the American people are once again responding. On this World AIDS Day, we are proud to stand with our friends and partners in this urgent struggle. And every life we help to save makes us proud to be Americans."

- US Aid To Afghanistan Expected To Reach $5.5 Billion Over Five Years. Afghan Finance Minister Anwar ul-Haq Ahadi said today he expects US development assistance to his country to be approximately $5.5 billion over the next five years. Ahadi made the assessment as the two countries signed a memorandum of understanding on aid agreements that outline plans for American support for programs in education, health care, economic development and political development. US Ambassador Ronald Neumann said at the signing ceremony in Kabul, "Supporting a prosperous and democratic Afghanistan is vitally important to all branches of the United States government and to the American people."

- House GOP Preparing Tax Reconciliation Bill For Action Next Week. House GOP leaders are expected next week to try and finish some major business items left undone prior to the Thanksgiving recess. At the top of the list for December floor action are bills on border security and tax relief. According to a Ways and Means Committee document, the tax relief bill will contain the following provisions:

One-Year Extension of Provisions Expiring in 2005:

1. Exempt personal tax credits, such as the dependent care, HOPE and Lifetime Learning credits, from the AMT.
2. State and local sales tax deduction.
3. Research and experimentation tax credit. In addition to the extension, the credit is enhanced by providing an alternative method for calculating the credit.
4. Above-the-line deduction for higher education expenses.
5. Above-the-line deduction for out-of-pocket teacher classroom expenses.
6. Authority to issue Qualified Zone Academy Bonds (QZABs) for school modernization, equipment and teacher training in high-poverty areas.
7. Enhanced charitable deduction for computer donations to schools and public libraries.
8. Work Opportunity Tax Credit (WOTC) for hiring individuals who face barriers to employment. In addition to the extension, the age limit for eligible food stamp recipients is increased from 25 to 35.
9. Welfare-to-Work Tax Credit for hiring individuals who have received public assistance for an extended period of time.
10. Incentives for business activity on Indian reservations
    a. Wage tax credit for employment on Indian reservations.
    b. Accelerated depreciation for business investment on Indian reservations.
11. Fifteen-year depreciation period for restaurants and leasehold improvements.
12. Availability of Archer MSAs (Medical Savings Accounts).
13. Suspension of limit on percentage depletion for oil and gas produced from marginal wells.
14. Tax incentives to revitalize the District of Columbia.
15. Possession tax credit for American Samoa.
16. Excise tax for enforcing mental health parity rules.

Two-Year Extension of Certain Expiring Provisions:

1. "Savers credit" for lower income workers who contribute to retirement savings accounts.

2. Higher expensing limit and phase-out threshold under section 179 (i.e., small business expensing).
3. Expensing of brownfield remediation costs. In addition to the extension, the definition of a contaminated site is expanded to include sites contaminated by petroleum products.
4. Active financing exception under Subpart F so that domestic manufacturers and U.S.-based financial service firms can price their products competitively. In addition to the extension, certain cross-border payments of dividends, interest, rents, and royalties between related foreign subsidiaries are also exempted from Subpart F.
5. Reduced tax rates on capital gains and dividends.

Miscellaneous Provisions:

1. Application of the active trade or business test on an affiliated group basis. The provision simplifies the application of this test by applying the same standard regardless of whether a business is owned by a holding company or owned directly.
2. Clarification of tax treatment for environmental cleanup "settlement funds." The provision treats these funds as governmentally owned (i.e., not subject to tax) if certain standards and requirements are met.
3. Capital gains treatment for self-created musical works that are sold by the artist. Under current law, such sales are taxed as regular income.
4. Reduction of the threshold for application of the tonnage tax from 10,000 pounds under current law to 6,000 deadweight tons.
5. Repeal of the current-law requirement that veterans must have served before 1977 to be eligible for affordable mortgages financed with State-issued qualified veterans' mortgage bonds.
6. Codification and extension of IRS rules that govern the tax treatment of the "Permanent University Fund." This Fund is used to finance the activities of certain State universities.

- Bush Signs Bill Authorizing Rosa Parks Statue At Capitol. President Bush signed a bill today authorizing a statue of Rosa Parks in the Capitol's Statuary Hall. At a signing ceremony that included members of Parks' family, Bush said of the woman who would not give up her seat on a bus in Montgomery, Alabama in 1955, "By refusing to give in, Rosa Parks called America back to its founding promise of equality and justice for everyone." Parks will be the first black woman to be represented in the hall, where many states have status honoring important figures in their history.

- Americans To Press Iraqi Government To Cut Back On Personal Security Details. Military sources in Iraq have told U.S.News and the Bulletin about a burgeoning security problem they now hope to fix: There are 12,000 personal bodyguards employed by various people in the current Iraqi transitional government, according to a U.S. officer. One Iraqi official alone has 1,600 people in his personal security detail, the source said. To make matters worse, some American military leaders say some of these virtual militias of bodyguards don't always follow the rules. And because most Iraqis cannot differentiate between the bodyguards and the regular security forces, the unregulated security details are giving the real army and police a bad name. American military officials in Iraq briefed top commanders about the problem this week. They say they hope to push forward a plan to reform and shrink the size of the security details after the December 15 election. -- Bulletin exclusive from U.S. News

- Regional Editorial Boards Largely Unimpressed With Bush Speech. A survey of editorials in large regional dailies across the nation suggest President Bush has a lot of selling to do on the war in Iraq, at least with editorial writers. Editorials' complaints varied from question about the accuracy of many of the statements made by President Bush in his speech and asserted in the plan released yesterday, to complaints about a lack of a timetable for withdrawal, to questions about whether the US should be in Iraq at all.

  Minneapolis Star Tribune: "President Bush gave an impassioned and rosy speech on the way forward in Iraq at the U.S. Naval Academy Wednesday. It's just too bad that the picture he painted of today's Iraq was an illusion, and most of his assertions about the future were wrongheaded."

  St. Louis Post-Dispatch: "The war in Iraq is not vital to U.S. interests. The war on terror is no more likely to be won or lost in Iraq than the Cold War was to be won or lost in Vietnam. The sooner we can develop a plan to get out of Iraq, rebuild our military and refocus our resources and attention on the terrorists behind Sept. 11, the closer we'll be to real victory."

  The Chicago Sun-Times did not have an editorial on the speech, but did feature a political cartoon showing Bush saying "stay the course" next to a field of soldiers' graves.

Baltimore Sun: Referring to Bush's assessment of the situation in his speech, "It would be great, if it were believable. ... For the record, the Iraqi insurgency is not in its last throes. The country is deteriorating into a vicious civil conflict, and the United States has only bad choices ahead. The man at the helm seems blind to that, intent as he is on chasing after a pipe-dream vision of success."

Seattle Post-Intelligencer: "President Bush played his Iraqi cards, the worn ones he always puts on the table. His speech Wednesday offered a few traces of cause for optimism. ... The president promises to 'stay the course.' But we still don't know when, how or if Iraqis will be left alone to perform the essential task of democracy: determining their own course."

St. Petersburg Times: "Bush offered precious little Wednesday other than an optimistic assessment and a stubborn determination to stay the course. That is not enough for impatient members of Congress and Americans who have lost faith in this president and are tired of generalities about a war with no definable end."

Des Moines Register. "We've heard it all before. If Wednesday's stage-managed speech at the Naval Academy was meant to restore President Bush's credibility on Iraq, it won't work unless he follows up with something more concrete — namely, a timetable. ... Bush cannot ask Americans to be infinitely patient with an open-ended commitment of blood and treasure without letting them in on how long it will take to prepare the Iraqis to defend themselves."

Akron Beacon-Journal. Bush's speech "was ultimately discouraging. His resolve was once again impressive. Still, it isn't enough to tell stories of modest progress. The imperative doesn't involve charting the number of steps forward compared to the steps back. The overall pace of achievement must be accelerated, the clock so plainly ticking. Americans should expect to see a White House doing all that it can to meet its objective. That wasn't part of the president's address."

While most editorial boards were negative, a number of editorial pages adopted a wait-and-see attitude:

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel: Bush "gave the American people his most detailed strategy yet to defeat terrorism in Iraq and establish a stable, progressive government there. But the strategy is absent one key detail: a flexible timetable for withdrawal. Moreover, even absent a timetable, there are reasonable doubts about whether it can succeed. Hard work and good luck will be needed if the far-reaching goals are to be reached." After laying out a series of suggested strategic moves, the Journal-Sentinel concludes, "If these and other steps can be taken, we're hopeful that next year could see what all Americans want to see in Iraq: a turnaround."

Denver Post: (referring the plan released yesterday), "The document is a familiar recap of U.S. policy and White House optimism, but there is more detail than in previous statements, and it sets welcome benchmarks that will allow both the public and Washington decisionmakers to assess the effort. ... Americans and Iraqi allies are both looking for an end to the conflict. We hope the president realizes that patience is growing thin."

Cleveland Plain Dealer: "Bush's conclusion - that conditions on the ground and not timetables set by Washington will determine when the troops will come home - remains valid. Having dismantled the mechanisms of fear that once allowed Iraq to function, no matter how imperfectly, it is incumbent upon this nation to leave it with at least the framework on which to build a democratic state. ... This victory, if it is to be won, demands American patience. And that's a fast-disappearing attribute that only marked progress will restore."

Some papers did take a positive view of Bush's performance. For example:

Chicago Tribune: "President Bush traveled to the U.S. Naval Academy on Wednesday to defend his handling of the war. This time he armed himself with something more than bravado. He came with a strategy and specifics about Iraq's accelerating progress toward victory."

Miami Herald: "President Bush's speech at the U.S. Naval Academy yesterday marks a welcome change in the way the administration tries to make its case for the war in Iraq. Instead of attacking critics, Mr. Bush acknowledged the need for a healthy debate about the war. Instead of the shopworn slogan, 'stay the course,' Mr. Bush in his speech and an accompanying 35-page document outlined a broad strategy that includes political, economic and military objectives. The president seemed to be more candid, as well, about the difficulties that lie ahead, which are considerable."

- Republicans Gleeful That Pelosi Is Calling For Fast Troop Withdrawal. Republican strategists are delighted that House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi has called for fast U.S. withdrawal from Iraq. The California liberal yesterday endorsed the plan offered by pro-defense Democrat John Murtha of Pennsylvania, whose break with the administration over Iraq has encouraged other Democrats to more boldly criticize the President's policy. GOP insiders argue that Pelosi is perceived by middle-of-the-road voters as overly partisan and out of the mainstream. Her endorsement of the pullout will only hurt that cause, the theory goes. Pelosi's problem is that "she only knows 'no,'" Republican pollster Frank Luntz told U.S. News and the Bulletin. "She's not intriguing. She's not compelling. She's just angry." And she's a very poor spokesman for the Democratic party, says Luntz. On the other hand, Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada makes a good impression on voters because he seems reasonable, mild-mannered, and relatively non-partisan. "He talks about disappointment and frustration [with Bush]," Luntz says, arguing that this approach is far more popular with voters than the politics of rage and obstruction. -- Bulletin exclusive from U.S. News

- Media Focus On Cheney's Sound Bites Hurt His Public Image. There's a bit of good news for Vice President Dick Cheney about his image, which has taken a battering lately because he is associated with everything that's gone wrong in Iraq: The more swing voters hear Cheney talk, the more sense he makes to them. Private GOP focus groups find that when voters are placed in a room and shown an entire Cheney speech, they are impressed with his intellect, his articulateness and his views. It's the sound bites that get him in trouble, because television editors generally boil down his statements to the most provocative and conservative few seconds they can find. The trouble for the veep is that his full speeches are almost never carried in their entirety. "Cheney in 'long form' is as effective as he ever was," says a prominent GOP consultant. "but in sound bites, he loses his 'oomph.' "– Bulletin exclusive from U.S. News

- Bush Looking To Mend Hill Fences With Holiday Parties. GOP insiders say President Bush has a perfect opportunity to start improving his fortunes on Capitol Hill in the next few weeks. They say Bush can mend some fences with GOP legislators if he turns on the charm at the White House holiday parties, which are a fixture of the capital's social circuit in mid-December. Look for Bush to make nice as he spreads holiday cheer amid the endless platters of boiled shrimp, lamb chops, and London broil traditionally served in the beautifully decorated East Room -- along with free-flowing beer and wine. (The President doesn't drink alcohol but plenty of senators and House members do.) Insiders predict he will buttonhole legislators and make the argument that they need to hold together or lose any prospect of passing major legislation in 2006 – which would enable Democrats to label the GOP as the do-nothing party in the mid-term elections. "Bush needs to reach out and say, 'join me,'" says a prominent Republican who advises congressional conservatives. And making his pitch in the convivial Christmas atmosphere could make him all the more effective. -- Bulletin exclusive from U.S. News

- GAO Finds Medicaid Overpaying For Medicines. A GAO report requested by the House Energy and Commerce Committee concludes that Medicaid is significantly overpaying for prescription medicines. After surveying five states practices -- Mississippi, Montana, Pennsylvania, South Carolina and Utah – GAO concluded, "State payments for brand-name drugs exceeded the average manufacturers price by 12 percent, on average; exceeded the 'Best Price' by 36 percent, on average; and exceeded the Federal Supply Schedule price by 73 percent, on average." In 1990, expenditures for medicines were $4.6 billion, comprising 7 percent of total medical care expenditures. By 2003, expenditures for medicines rose to $33.8 billion, comprising 13 percent of total medical care expenditures.

- Democrats To Probe Alito's Vanguard Decision. Senate Judiciary Committee Democrats are stepping up their probe of Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito's holdings in Vanguard funds amid conflicting explanations on why he didn't recuse himself from a Vanguard case in 2002. "We're going to dig into it further," said a key aide to a Senate Democrat on the committee. "His excuses just don't add up." Critics do not believe that Alito profited from his involvement in the case, and in fact suggest his ruling was against the financial firm. But they want to find out why he didn't live up to his promise during his 1990 appeals court confirmation to recuse himself on cases involving the firm. They concede that it's not an issue that will likely thwart his confirmation. Alito holds several Vanguard funds. Democrats say that when they first raised the issue, the White House said that a "computer glitch" failed to alert Alito to the conflict. But Democrats say that it was no secret that the 2002 case Alito decided involved Vanguard. Later, he said that his promise was too broad. "Which is it? We want to find out why he didn't do as he promised," said the aide. -- Bulletin exclusive from U.S. News

- Congress Studying Presidential Tax Reform Panel's Ideas. While few lawmakers are publicly endorsing the widespread changes proposed last month by the President's bipartisan tax reform panel, lawmakers and Treasury officials say that they are seriously studying it for tips to add to next year's tax package. Many of the headline issues, such as ending the mortgage write-off, are being ignored, but other ideas like a flat or consumption tax are getting a thorough review as the White House and Congress consider election-year changes to the tax code. Douglas Holtz-Eakin, outgoing head of the Congressional Budget Office, today said that the report was the first major case made for a consumption-based tax. "I think that's important," he said without indicating his support for it. In an interview with reporters, however, he noted that unlike some past tax reform plans, the latest wasn't generating a lot of support or even interest outside the beltway. "It didn't exactly fly off the shelves," he said. But the consumption tax plan and possible adjustments to the alternative minimum tax are being considered by lawmakers, according to leadership aides. -- Bulletin exclusive from U.S. News

- Departing CBO Head Still Calling For Social Security Overhaul. As he prepares to depart as director of the Congressional Budget Office, Douglas Holtz-Eakin is lamenting the failure of the administration to reform Social Security, which he believes is a must if the rest of the federal budget is to be fixed. "Nothing happened," he said of the President's year-long effort. "That's really frustrating," he said in a roundtable interview with reporters today. Holtz-Eakin, who leaves this month, said that when compared to cutting the deficit or reforming Medicare and Medicaid, making changes to Social Security is easy. One of his suggestions: Make Social Security pay for itself. "Put the thing on a cash flow basis," he said. Minus such a radical change, he suggested that lawmakers and the administration stop kicking reform down the road just because it's currently in the black. "More time is not going to solve these problems," he said. "I think the key is now." But he conceded that making the system pay for itself would probably mean spending cuts and tax increases. -- Bulletin exclusive from U.S. News

- Political Notes. President. DNC Chairman Howard Dean, in an interview on The Tonight Show With Jay Leno last night, was asked whether he would run for president in 2008. Dean said, "I've sworn that I -- not sworn, but I said that as long I took this job as the DNC chair, my job is to fix the party, and not to run." Told he sounded like he would like to run again, Dean replied, "I'd like to make a big change in the White House. Whether I'm there or not is not so important." ... David Yepsen writes today in the Des Moines Register that Iowans "have to be wary of Dean" and his plans to shake up the primary calendar because he's "not always had nice things to say about the Iowa caucuses, and his actions must be watched to see if he's looking to pay back Iowa and New Hampshire for his 2004 losses there." ... John DiStaso writes in the New Hampshire Union Leader today that both Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R) and New York Gov. George Pataki (R) will be visiting the state over the next few weeks. ... Sen.   Governors. Conservative activist Len Munsil (R) will step from his post at the Center for Arizona Policy to explore a gubernatorial bid, the AP reports this morning. ... California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) has hired a former Democratic Party activist and high-ranking aide for ousted Gov. Gray Davis (D) as his new chief of staff, the LA Times reports today. ... The Rockford Register Star reports this morning that Illinois state Treasurer Judy Baar Topinka (R) yesterday entered that state's gubernatorial race, "pledging to return honesty, credibility and fiscal responsibility to state government." The Chicago Tribune adds that ex-Gov. Jim Edgar (R) will chair her campaign. ... The AP reports this morning that Oregon state sen. Vicki Walker (D) says it is "highly likely" she will launch a primary challenge to Gov. Ted Kulongoski (D), but said she would not do so if former Gov. John Kitzhaber (D) decided to enter the race.

  Senate. The Washington Post reports this morning that President Bush helped Maryland Senate candidate Michael Steele (R) raise $500k at a fundraiser yesterday, but coverage in local papers, including the Washington Post and the Baltimore Sun, focused on how that sum compared poorly to other candidates' fundraising and how Bush's support for Steele may be problematic in the heavily Democratic state.

  House. The Oklahoman reports this morning that former state Rep. Bill Graves (R) has entered the OK5 open-seat race, saying he is a conservative "and will remain so" in Washington. ... The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette reports this morning that broadcaster Stan Savran (D), who had been heavily courted by the DCCC, has decided not to challenge PA18 Rep. Tim Murphy (R).

LAST LAUGHS:

Late Night Political Humor.

Jay Leno: "A little reminder for all you lobbyists, oil executives and defense contractors out there, only 26 more shopping days to buy a Congressman before Christmas. So remember that."

Jay Leno: "As you may have heard by now, California Congressman Duke Cunningham has resigned from office after admitting he broke the law by taking $2.4 million in bribes. Isn't that ironic? The only time you're sure a politician is telling the truth is when he's admitting he's a crook."

Jay Leno: "Imagine being considered too unethical for Congress? That's like a rat hair getting kicked out of a hot dog."

Jay Leno: "Well, many in Washington are saying they're very disappointed in Cunningham because he broke the most important rule of all in Congress: never admit guilt. D'oh!"

Jay Leno: "One of the bribes that Cunningham took was a yacht. Somebody gave him a yacht, and he called it 'The Dukester.' How stupid do you have to be to take a bribe with your name on it? It's got your name on it!"

Jay Leno: "You make $160,000 a year. You have a big yacht, a Rolls Royce. Hello?"

Jay Leno: "And President Bush was at the Mexican border yesterday. Apparently, his poll numbers are so low, I think he was trying to make a run for it."

Jay Leno: "Actually, he was giving a speech on illegal immigration. He's getting tough, cracking down. He said that people that cross the border illegally will be sent back to their own countries. You know what that means? Maybe our troops are coming home!"

Jay Leno: "And today at the U.S. Naval Academy, President Bush released the White House strategy for winning the war in Iraq. Nice to know they didn't rush into that one, huh? 2 1/2 years later. What do you think? Maybe stuck in the copy machine? Paper jam, possibly?"

Jay Leno: "No, in his speech, President Bush said 'we need to rebuild Iraq, we need to provide the people with hope, and give them jobs. And hey, if it works there, maybe we'll try it in New Orleans.' What do you think? Yeah!"

Jay Leno: "Right after he finished the speech, the rebuttal was given by the Democratic leader, Barbra Streisand."

Jay Leno: "No, actually, the rebuttal was given by John Kerry. And then John Kerry asked for more time to give a rebuttal to his own rebuttal."

Jay Leno: "And 'The L.A. Times' reporting that the United States -- this is unbelievable. We are now paying Iraqi newspapers, we're giving them money to run stories secretly written by us about all the wonderful things the United States is doing in Iraq. You know, like establishing freedom of the press. You know."

Jay Leno: "Big controversy in Washington over the Christmas tree. You know, we are so politically correct. For years it was called what? 'The Christmas tree.' But in recent years, we had to call it 'the holiday tree.' Well, now, Dennis Hastert, Speaker of the House, he wants to call it the Christmas tree again. And everybody has their own idea about what it should be called. Like President Bush, show the chart. President Bush wants to call it 'that big pointy greeny thingy with the shiny objects.' Vice President Cheney wants to call it 'one of those things we knock down to get oil.' Rumsfeld, he wanted to call it 'the divert attention away from the Iraq war tree.' You see the name they went with? Show the name they went with. 'Spruce Willis."

David Letterman: "I think this is good news. The White House released a 35-page plan entitled 'Our National Strategy For Victory In Iraq.' 35 pages. It is called 'Our National Strategy For Victory In Iraq.' President Bush refuses to set a timetable for reading it."

David Letterman: Top Ten New Strategies for Victory in Iraq:

"10. Make an even larger 'Mission Accomplished' sign.
9. Encourage Iraqis to settle their feud like Dave and Oprah.
8. Put that go-getter Michael Brown in charge.
7. Launch new slogan, it's not 'Iraq' it's 'Weraq'.
6. Just do whatever he did when he captured Osama.
5. A little more vacation time at the ranch to clear his head.
4. Pack on a quick thirty pounds and trade places with Jeb.
3. Wait, you mean it ain't going well?
2. Boost morale by doing his hilarious locked door gag.
1. Place Saddam back in power and tell him, 'It's your problem, dude.'"

REMARKS BY THE PRESIDENT ON THE WAR ON TERROR

United States Naval Academy
Annapolis, Maryland
November 30, 2005

THE PRESIDENT: Thank you. Thanks, please be seated. Please be seated. Thanks for the warm welcome. It's good to be back at the Naval Academy. I'm pleased to provide a convenient excuse for you to miss class.

This is the first year that every class of midshipmen at this Academy arrived after the attacks of September the 11th, 2001. Each of you has volunteered to wear our nation's uniform in a time of war -- knowing all the risks and dangers that accompany military service. Our citizens are grateful for your devotion to duty -- and America is proud of the men and women of the United States Naval Academy.

I thank Admiral Rempt for his invitation for me to come and give this speech. I appreciate Admiral Mike Mullen. I'm traveling today with a man who's done a fine job as the Secretary of Defense -- Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld. Navy aviator, Don Rumsfeld. I'm proud that the Governor of the great state of Maryland, Bob Ehrlich, and his wife, Kendel, is with us. Thanks for being here, Governor.

I so appreciate that members of the United States Congress have joined us, starting with the Chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Senator John Warner of the state of Virginia. Former Secretary of the United States Navy, I might add. Chairman of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, Congressman Pete Hoekstra. From the state of Arizona, Congressman John Shadegg. And from the state of Indiana, Congressman Mike Pence. I'm honored you all came, thanks for being here.

I appreciate the Mayor of the city of Annapolis, Mayor Ellen Moyer, joining us. I want to thank all the state and local officials. I want to thank the faculty members here. Thank you all for letting me come by.

Six months ago, I came here to address the graduating class of 2005. I spoke to them about the importance of their service in the first war of the 21st century -- the global war on terror. I told the class of 2005 that four years at this Academy had prepared them morally, mentally and physically for the challenges ahead. And now they're meeting those challenges as officers in the United States Navy and Marine Corps.

Some of your former classmates are training with Navy SEAL teams that will storm terrorist safe houses in lightning raids. Others are preparing to lead Marine rifle platoons that will hunt the enemy in the mountains of Afghanistan and the streets of Iraqi cities. Others are training as naval aviators who will fly combat missions over the skies of Afghanistan and Iraq and elsewhere. Still others are training as sailors and submariners who will deliver the combat power of the United States to the farthest regions of the world -- and deliver compassionate assistance to those suffering from natural disasters. Whatever their chosen mission, every graduate of the class of 2005 is bringing honor to the uniform -- and helping to bring us victory in the war on terror.

In the years ahead, you'll join them in the fight. Your service is needed, because our nation is engaged in a war that is being fought on many fronts -- from the streets of Western cities, to the mountains of Afghanistan, the islands of Southeast Asia and the Horn of Africa. This war is going to take many turns, and the enemy must be defeated on every battlefield. Yet the terrorists have made it clear that Iraq is the central front in their war against humanity, and so we must recognize Iraq as the central front in the war on terror.

As we fight the enemy in Iraq, every man and woman who volunteers to defend our nation deserves an unwavering commitment to the mission -- and a clear strategy for victory. A clear strategy begins with a clear understanding of the enemy we face. The enemy in Iraq is a combination of rejectionists, Saddamists and terrorists. The rejectionists are by far the largest group. These are ordinary Iraqis, mostly Sunni Arabs, who miss the privileged status they had under the regime of Saddam Hussein -- and they reject an Iraq in which they are no longer the dominant group.

Not all Sunnis fall into the rejectionist camp. Of those that do, most are not actively fighting us -- but some give aid and comfort to the enemy. Many Sunnis boycotted the January elections -- yet as democracy takes hold in Iraq, they are recognizing that opting out of the democratic process has hurt their interests. And today, those who advocate violent opposition are being increasingly isolated by Sunnis who choose peaceful participation in the democratic process. Sunnis voted in the recent constitutional referendum in large numbers – and Sunni coalitions have formed to compete in next month's elections -- or, this month's elections. We believe that, over time, most rejectionists will be persuaded to support a democratic Iraq led by a federal government that is a strong enough government to protect minority rights.

The second group that makes up the enemy in Iraq is smaller, but more determined. It contains former regime loyalists who held positions of power under Saddam Hussein -- people who still harbor dreams of returning to power. These hard-core Saddamists are trying to foment anti-democratic sentiment amongst the larger Sunni community. They lack popular support and therefore cannot stop Iraq's democratic progress. And over time, they can be marginalized and defeated by the Iraqi people and the security forces of a free Iraq.

The third group is the smallest, but the most lethal: the terrorists affiliated with or inspired by al Qaeda . Many are foreigners who are coming to fight freedom's progress in Iraq. This group includes terrorists from Saudi Arabia, and Syria, and Iran, and Egypt, and Sudan, and Yemen, and Libya, and other countries. Our commanders believe they're responsible for most of the suicide bombings, and the beheadings, and the other atrocities we see on our television.

They're led by a brutal terrorist named Zarqawi -- al Qaeda's chief of operations in Iraq -- who has pledged his allegiance to Osama bin Laden. Their objective is to drive the United States and coalition forces out of Iraq, and use the vacuum that would be created by an American retreat to gain control of that country. They would then use Iraq as a base from which to launch attacks against America, and overthrow moderate governments in the Middle East, and try to establish a totalitarian Islamic empire that reaches from Indonesia to Spain. That's their stated objective. That's what their leadership has said.

These terrorists have nothing to offer the Iraqi people. All they have is the capacity and the willingness to kill the innocent and create chaos for the cameras. They are trying to shake our will to achieve their stated objectives. They will fail. America's will is strong. And they will fail because the will to power is no match for the universal desire to live in liberty.

The terrorists in Iraq share the same ideology as the terrorists who struck the United States on September the 11th. Those terrorists share the same ideology with those who blew up commuters in London and Madrid, murdered tourists in Bali, workers in Riyadh, and guests at a wedding in Amman, Jordan. Just last week, they massacred Iraqi children and their parents at a toy give-away outside an Iraqi hospital.

This is an enemy without conscience -- and they cannot be appeased. If we were not fighting and destroying this enemy in Iraq, they would not be idle. They would be plotting and killing Americans across the world and within our own borders. By fighting these terrorists in Iraq, Americans in uniform are defeating a direct threat to the American people. Against this adversary, there is only one effective response: We will never back down. We will never give in. And we will never accept anything less than complete victory.

To achieve victory over such enemies, we are pursuing a comprehensive strategy in Iraq. Americans should have a clear understanding of this strategy -- how we look at the war, how we see the enemy, how we define victory, and what we're doing to achieve it. So today, we're releasing a document called the "National Strategy for Victory in Iraq." This is an unclassified version of the strategy we've been pursuing in Iraq, and it is posted on the White House website -- whitehouse.gov. I urge all Americans to read it.

Our strategy in Iraq has three elements. On the political side, we know that free societies are peaceful societies, so we're helping the Iraqis build a free society with inclusive democratic institutions that will protect the interests of all Iraqis. We're working with the Iraqis to help them engage those who can be persuaded to join the new Iraq – and to marginalize those who never will. On the security side, coalition and Iraqi security forces are on the offensive against the enemy, cleaning out areas controlled by the terrorists and Saddam loyalists, leaving Iraqi forces to hold territory taken from the enemy, and following up with targeted reconstruction to help Iraqis rebuild their lives.

As we fight the terrorists, we're working to build capable and effective Iraqi security forces, so they can take the lead in the fight – and eventually take responsibility for the safety and security of their citizens without major foreign assistance.

And on the economic side, we're helping the Iraqis rebuild their infrastructure, reform their economy, and build the prosperity that will give all Iraqis a stake in a free and peaceful Iraq. In doing all this we have involved the United Nations, other international organizations, our coalition partners, and supportive regional states in helping Iraqis build their future.

In the days ahead, I'll be discussing the various pillars of our strategy in Iraq. Today, I want to speak in depth about one aspect of this strategy that will be critical to victory in Iraq -- and that's the training of Iraqi security forces. To defeat the terrorists and marginalize the Saddamists and rejectionists, Iraqis need strong military and police forces. Iraqi troops bring knowledge and capabilities to the fight that coalition forces cannot.

Iraqis know their people, they know their language, and they know their culture -- and they know who the terrorists are. Iraqi forces are earning the trust of their countrymen -- who are willing to help them in the fight against the enemy. As the Iraqi forces grow in number, they're helping to keep a better hold on the cities taken from the enemy. And as the Iraqi forces grow more capable, they are increasingly taking the lead in the fight against the terrorists. Our goal is to train enough Iraqi forces so they can carry the fight -- and this will take time and patience. And it's worth the time, and it's worth the effort -- because Iraqis and Americans share a common enemy, and when that enemy is defeated in Iraq, Americans will be safer here at home.

The training of the Iraqi security forces is an enormous task, and it always hasn't gone smoothly. We all remember the reports of some Iraqi security forces running from the fight more than a year ago. Yet in the past year, Iraqi forces have made real progress. At this time last year, there were only a handful of Iraqi battalions ready for combat. Now, there are over 120 Iraqi Army and Police combat battalions in the fight against the terrorists -- typically comprised of between 350 and 800 Iraqi forces. Of these, about 80 Iraqi battalions are fighting side-by-side with coalition forces, and about 40 others are taking the lead in the fight. Most of these 40 battalions are controlling their own battle space, and conducting their own operations against the terrorists with some coalition support -- and they're helping to turn the tide of this struggle in freedom's favor. America and our troops are proud to stand with the brave Iraqi fighters.

The progress of the Iraqi forces is especially clear when the recent anti-terrorist operations in Tal Afar are compared with last year's assault in Fallujah. In Fallujah, the assault was led by nine coalition battalions made up primarily of United States Marines and Army – with six Iraqi battalions supporting them. The Iraqis fought and sustained casualties. Yet in most situations, the Iraqi role was limited to protecting the flanks of coalition forces, and securing ground that had already been cleared by our troops. This year in TAL Afar, it was a very different story.

The assault was primarily led by Iraqi security forces -- 11 Iraqi battalions, backed by five coalition battalions providing support. Many Iraqi units conducted their own anti-terrorist operations and controlled their own battle space -- hunting for enemy fighters and securing neighborhoods block-by-block. To consolidate their military success, Iraqi units stayed behind to help maintain law and order – and reconstruction projects have been started to improve infrastructure and create jobs and provide hope.

One of the Iraqi soldiers who fought in TAL Afar was a private named Tarek Hazem. This brave Iraqi fighter says, "We're not afraid. We're here to protect our country. All we feel is motivated to kill the terrorists." Iraqi forces not only cleared the city, they held it. And because of the skill and courage of the Iraqi forces, the citizens of TAL Afar were able to vote in October's constitutional referendum.

As Iraqi forces increasingly take the lead in the fight against the terrorists, they're also taking control of more and more Iraqi territory. At this moment, over 30 Iraqi Army battalions have assumed primary control of their own areas of responsibility. In Baghdad, Iraqi battalions have taken over major sectors of the capital – including some of the city's toughest neighborhoods. Last year, the area around Baghdad's Haifa Street was so thick with terrorists that it earned the nickname "Purple Heart Boulevard." Then Iraqi forces took responsibility for this dangerous neighborhood -- and attacks are now down.

Our coalition has handed over roughly 90 square miles of Baghdad province to Iraqi security forces. Iraqi battalions have taken over responsibility for areas in South-Central Iraq, sectors of Southeast Iraq, sectors of Western Iraq, and sectors of North-Central Iraq. As Iraqi forces take responsibility for more of their own territory, coalition forces can concentrate on training Iraqis and hunting down high-value targets, like the terrorist Zarqawi and his associates.

We're also transferring forward operating bases to Iraqi control. Over a dozen bases in Iraq have been handed over to the Iraqi government -- including Saddam Hussein's former palace in Tikrit, which has served as the coalition headquarters in one of Iraq's most dangerous regions. From many of these bases, the Iraqi security forces are planning and executing operations against the terrorists -- and bringing security and pride to the Iraqi people.

Progress by the Iraqi security forces has come, in part, because we learned from our earlier experiences and made changes in the way we help train Iraqi troops. When our coalition first arrived, we began the process of creating an Iraqi Army to defend the country from external threats, and an Iraqi Civil Defense Corps to help provide the security within Iraq's borders. The civil defense forces did not have sufficient firepower or training -- they proved to be no match for an enemy armed with machine guns, rocket-propelled grenades, and mortars. So the approach was adjusted. Working with Iraq's leaders, we moved the civil defense forces into the Iraqi Army, we changed the way they're trained and equipped, and we focused the Army's mission on defeating those fighting against a free Iraq, whether internal or external.

Now, all Iraqi Army recruits receive about the same length of basic training as new recruits in the U.S. Army -- a five-week core course, followed by an additional three-to-seven weeks of specialized training. With coalition help, Iraqis have established schools for the Iraqi military services, an Iraqi military academy, a non-commissioned officer academy, a military police school, a bomb disposal school -- and NATO has established an Iraqi Joint Staff College. There's also an increased focus on leadership training, with professional development courses for Iraqi squad leaders and platoon sergeants and warrant officers and sergeants-major. A new generation of Iraqi officers is being trained, leaders who will lead their forces with skill -- so they can defeat the terrorists and secure their freedom.

Similar changes have taken place in the training of the Iraqi police. When our coalition first arrived, Iraqi police recruits spent too much time of their training in classroom lectures -- and they received limited training in the use of small arms. This did not adequately prepare the fight they would face. And so we changed the way the Iraqi police are trained. Now, police recruits spend more of their time outside the classroom with intensive hands-on training in anti-terrorism operations and real-world survival skills.

Iraq has now six basic police academies, and one in Jordan, that together produce over 3,500 new police officers every ten weeks. The Baghdad police academy has simulation models where Iraqis train to stop IED attacks and operate roadblocks. And because Iraqi police are not just facing common criminals, they are getting live-fire training with the AK-47s.

As more and more skilled Iraqi security forces have come online, there's been another important change in the way new Iraqi recruits are trained. When the training effort began, nearly all the trainers came from coalition countries. Today, the vast majority of Iraqi police and army recruits are being taught by Iraqi instructors. By training the trainers, we're helping Iraqis create an institutional capability that will allow the Iraqi forces to continue to develop and grow long after coalition forces have left Iraq.

As the training has improved, so has the quality of the recruits being trained. Even though the terrorists are targeting Iraqi police and army recruits, there is no shortage of Iraqis who are willing to risk their lives to secure the future of a free Iraq.

The efforts to include more Sunnis in the future of Iraq were given a significant boost earlier this year. More than 60 influential Sunni clerics issued a fatwa calling on young Sunnis to join the Iraqi security forces, "for the sake of preserving the souls, property and honor" of the Iraqi people. These religious leaders are helping to make the Iraqi security forces a truly national institution -- one that is able to serve, protect and defend all the Iraqi people.

Some critics dismiss this progress and point to the fact that only one Iraqi battalion has achieved complete independence from the coalition. To achieve complete independence, an Iraqi battalion must do more than fight the enemy on its own -- it must also have the ability to provide its own support elements, including logistics, airlift, intelligence, and command and control through their ministries. Not every Iraqi unit has to meet this level of capability in order for the Iraqi security forces to take the lead in the fight against the enemy. As a matter of fact, there are some battalions from NATO militaries that would not be able to meet this standard. The facts are that Iraqi units are growing more independent and more capable; they are defending their new democracy with courage and determination. They're in the fight today, and they will be in the fight for freedom tomorrow.

We're also helping Iraqis build the institutions they need to support their own forces. For example, a national depot has been established north of Baghdad that is responsible for supplying the logistical needs of the ten divisions of the Iraqi Army. Regional support units and base support units have been created across the country with the mission of supplying their own war fighters. Iraqis now have a small Air Force, that recently conducted its first combat airlift operations – bringing Iraqi troops to the front in TAL Afar. The new Iraqi Navy is now helping protect the vital ports of Basra and Umm Qasr. An Iraqi military intelligence school has been established to produce skilled Iraqi intelligence analysts and collectors. By taking all these steps, we're helping the Iraqi security forces become self-supporting so they can take the fight to the enemy, and so they can sustain themselves in the fight.

Over the past two and a half years, we've faced some setbacks in standing up a capable Iraqi security force -- and their performance is still uneven in some areas. Yet many of those forces have made real gains over the past year -- and Iraqi soldiers take pride in their progress. An Iraqi first lieutenant named Shoqutt describes the transformation of his unit this way: "I really think we've turned the corner here. At first, the whole country didn't take us seriously. Now things are different. Our guys are hungry to demonstrate their skill and to show the world."

Our troops in Iraq see the gains that Iraqis are making. Lieutenant Colonel Todd Wood of Richmond Hill, Georgia, is training Iraqi forces in Saddam Hussein's hometown of Tikrit. He says this about the Iraqi units he is working with: "They're pretty much ready to go it on their own ... What they're doing now would have been impossible a year ago ... These guys are patriots, willing to go out knowing the insurgents would like nothing better than to kill them and their families ... They're getting better, and they'll keep getting better."

Our commanders on the ground see the gains the Iraqis are making. General Marty Dempsey is the commander of the Multinational Security Transition Command. Here's what he says about the transformation of the Iraqi security forces: "It's beyond description. They are far better equipped, far better trained" than they once were. The Iraqis, General Dempsey says, are "increasingly in control of their future and their own security _ the Iraqi security forces are regaining control of the country."

As the Iraqi security forces stand up, their confidence is growing and they are taking on tougher and more important missions on their own. As the Iraqi security forces stand up, the confidence of the Iraqi people is growing -- and Iraqis are providing the vital intelligence needed to track down the terrorists. And as the Iraqi security forces stand up, coalition forces can stand down -- and when our mission of defeating the terrorists in Iraq is complete, our troops will return home to a proud nation.

This is a goal our Iraqi allies share. An Iraqi Army Sergeant named Abbass Abdul Jabar puts it this way: "We have to help the coalition forces as much as we can to give them a chance to go home. These guys have been helping us. [Now] we have to protect our own families." America will help the Iraqis so they can protect their families and secure their free nation. We will stay as long as necessary to complete the mission. If our military leaders tell me we need more troops, I will send them.

For example, we have increased our force levels in Iraq to 160,000 – up from 137,000 -- in preparation for the December elections. My commanders tell me that as Iraqi forces become more capable, the mission of our forces in Iraq will continue to change. We will continue to shift from providing security and conducting operations against the enemy nationwide, to conducting more specialized operations targeted at the most dangerous terrorists. We will increasingly move out of Iraqi cities, reduce the number of bases from which we operate, and conduct fewer patrols and convoys.

As the Iraqi forces gain experience and the political process advances, we will be able to decrease our troop levels in Iraq without losing our capability to defeat the terrorists. These decisions about troop levels will be driven by the conditions on the ground in Iraq and the good judgment of our commanders -- not by artificial timetables set by politicians in Washington.

Some are calling for a deadline for withdrawal. Many advocating an artificial timetable for withdrawing our troops are sincere -- but I believe they're sincerely wrong. Pulling our troops out before they've achieved their purpose is not a plan for victory. As Democratic Senator Joe Lieberman said recently, setting an artificial timetable would "discourage our troops because it seems to be heading for the door. It will encourage the terrorists, it will confuse the Iraqi people."

Senator Lieberman is right. Setting an artificial deadline to withdraw would send a message across the world that America is a weak and an unreliable ally. Setting an artificial deadline to withdraw would send a signal to our enemies -- that if they wait long enough, America will cut and run and abandon its friends. And setting an artificial deadline to withdraw would vindicate the terrorists' tactics of beheadings and suicide bombings and mass murder -- and invite new attacks on America. To all who wear the uniform, I make you this pledge: America will not run in the face of car bombers and assassins so long as I am your Commander-in-Chief.

And as we train Iraqis to take more responsibility in the battle with the terrorists, we're also helping them build a democracy that is worthy of their sacrifice. And in just over two-and-a-half years, the Iraqi people have made incredible progress on the road to lasting freedom. Iraqis have gone from living under the boot of a brutal tyrant, to liberation, free elections, and a democratic constitution -- and in 15 days they will go to the polls to elect a fully constitutional government that will lead them for the next four years.

With each ballot cast, the Iraqi people have sent a clear message to the terrorists: Iraqis will not be intimidated. The Iraqi people will determine the destiny of their country. The future of Iraq belongs to freedom. Despite the costs, the pain, and the danger, Iraqis are showing courage and are moving forward to build a free society and a lasting democracy in the heart of the Middle East -- and the United States of America will help them succeed.

Some critics continue to assert that we have no plan in Iraq except to, "stay the course." If by "stay the course," they mean we will not allow the terrorists to break our will, they are right. If by "stay the course," they mean we will not permit al Qaeda to turn Iraq into what Afghanistan was under the Taliban -- a safe haven for terrorism and a launching pad for attacks on America -- they are right, as well. If by "stay the course" they mean that we're not learning from our experiences, or adjusting our tactics to meet the challenges on the ground, then they're flat wrong. As our top commander in Iraq, General Casey, has said, "Our commanders on the ground are continuously adapting and adjusting, not only to what the enemy does, but also to try to out-think the enemy and get ahead of him." Our strategy in Iraq is clear, our tactics are flexible and dynamic; we have changed them as conditions required and they are bringing us victory against a brutal enemy.

Victory in Iraq will demand the continued determination and resolve of the American people. It will also demand the strength and personal courage of the men and women who wear our nation's uniform. And as the future officers of the United States Navy and Marine Corps, you're preparing to join this fight. You do so at a time when there is a vigorous debate about the war in Iraq. I know that for our men and women in uniform, this debate can be unsettling -- when you're risking your life to accomplish a mission, the last thing you want to hear is that mission being questioned in our nation's capital. I want you to know that while there may be a lot of heated rhetoric in Washington, D.C., one thing is not in dispute: The American people stand behind you.

And we should not fear the debate in Washington. It's one of the great strengths of our democracy that we can discuss our differences openly and honestly -- even at times of war. Your service makes that freedom possible. And today, because of the men and women in our military, people are expressing their opinions freely in the streets of Baghdad, as well.

Most Americans want two things in Iraq: They want to see our troops win, and they want to see our troops come home as soon as possible. And those are my goals as well. I will settle for nothing less than complete victory. In World War II, victory came when the Empire of Japan surrendered on the deck of the USS Missouri. In Iraq, there will not be a signing ceremony on the deck of a battleship. Victory will come when the terrorists and Saddamists can no longer threaten Iraq's democracy, when the Iraqi security forces can provide for the safety of their own citizens, and when Iraq is not a safe haven for terrorists to plot new attacks on our nation.

As we make progress toward victory, Iraqis will take more responsibility for their security, and fewer U.S. forces will be needed to complete the mission. America will not abandon Iraq. We will not turn that country over to the terrorists and put the American people at risk. Iraq will be a free nation and a strong ally in the Middle East -- and this will add to the security of the American people.

In the short run, we're going to bring justice to our enemies. In the long run, the best way to ensure the security of our own citizens is to spread the hope of freedom across the broader Middle East. We've seen freedom conquer evil and secure the peace before. In World War II, free nations came together to fight the ideology of fascism, and freedom prevailed -- and today Germany and Japan are democracies and they are allies in securing the peace. In the Cold War, freedom defeated the ideology of communism and led to a democratic movement that freed the nations of Eastern and Central Europe from Soviet domination – and today these nations are allies in the war on terror.

Today in the Middle East freedom is once again contending with an ideology that seeks to sow anger and hatred and despair. And like fascism and communism before, the hateful ideologies that use terror will be defeated by the unstoppable power of freedom, and as democracy spreads in the Middle East, these countries will become allies in the cause of peace.

Advancing the cause of freedom and democracy in the Middle East begins with ensuring the success of a free Iraq. Freedom's victory in that country will inspire democratic reformers from Damascus to Tehran, and spread hope across a troubled region, and lift a terrible threat from the lives of our citizens. By strengthening Iraqi democracy, we will gain a partner in the cause of peace and moderation in the Muslim world, and an ally in the worldwide struggle against -- against the terrorists. Advancing the ideal of democracy and self-government is the mission that created our nation -- and now it is the calling of a new generation of Americans. We will meet the challenge of our time. We will answer history's call with confidence -- because we know that freedom is the destiny of every man, woman and child on this earth.

Before our mission in Iraq is accomplished, there will be tough days ahead. A time of war is a time of sacrifice, and we've lost some very fine men and women in this war on terror. Many of you know comrades and classmates who left our shores to defend freedom and who did not live to make the journey home. We pray for the military families who mourn the loss of loves ones. We hold them in our hearts -- and we honor the memory of every fallen soldier, sailor, airman, Coast Guardsman, and Marine.

One of those fallen heroes is a Marine Corporal named Jeff Starr, who was killed fighting the terrorists in Ramadi earlier this year. After he died, a letter was found on his laptop computer. Here's what he wrote, he said, "[I]f you're reading this, then I've died in Iraq. I don't regret going. Everybody dies, but few get to do it for something as important as freedom. It may seem confusing why we are in Iraq, it's not to me. I'm here helping these people, so they can live the way we live. Not [to] have to worry about tyrants or vicious dictators_. Others have died for my freedom, now this is my mark."

There is only one way to honor the sacrifice of Corporal Starr and his fallen comrades -- and that is to take up their mantle, carry on their fight, and complete their mission.

We will take the fight to the terrorists. We will help the Iraqi people lay the foundations of a strong democracy that can govern itself, sustain itself, and defend itself. And by laying the foundations of freedom in Iraq, we will lay the foundation of peace for generations to come.

You all are the ones who will help accomplish all this. Our freedom and our way of life are in your hands -- and they're in the best of hands. I want to thank you for your service in the cause of freedom. I want to thank you for wearing the uniform. May God bless you all, and may God continue to bless the United States of America.

WHITE HOUSE FACT SHEET
Securing America Through Immigration Reform
November 28, 2005

On November 28, 2005, President Bush outlined the Strategy To Enhance America's Homeland Security Through Comprehensive Immigration Reform. Addressing the Customs and Border Protection agents stationed in southern Arizona, the President discussed the strategy to secure the border, prevent illegal crossings, and strengthen enforcement of immigration laws. The President also proposed to take pressure off the border by creating a Temporary Worker Program that meets the economy's demands while rejecting amnesty for those who break America's laws.

Securing The Border Is Essential To Securing The Homeland: Since he took office, the President has increased funding for border security by 60 percent. Border agents have apprehended and sent home more than 4.5 million people coming into the country illegally - including about 350,000 with criminal records. The U.S. border must be open to trade and tourism - and closed to criminals, drug dealers, and terrorists.

The President Will Work With Congress To Pass And Sign Into Law Comprehensive Immigration Reform: Comprehensive immigration reform is a top priority for the Administration. Already, Congress is making great strides and has a chance to move forward on a strategy to enforce immigration laws, secure America, and uphold the Nation's deepest values. The President will continue working with Congress so that he can sign a comprehensive immigration reform bill into law in 2006.

The President's Strategy For Comprehensive Immigration Reform: Comprehensive Immigration Reform Begins With Securing The Border. To secure the border, the President is pursuing a three-part plan.

- First, The U.S. Will Return Every Illegal Entrant Caught Crossing The Southwest Border—With No Exceptions: More than 85 percent of apprehended illegal immigrants are from Mexico, and most are immediately escorted back across the border within 24 hours. To prevent them from trying to cross again, the Federal government is using interior repatriation whereby Mexican illegal entrants are returned to their hometowns, making it more difficult for them to attempt another crossing. This approach is showing great promise. In a West Arizona desert pilot program, nearly 35,000 illegal immigrants were returned to Mexico through interior repatriation, and only about 8 percent turned up trying to cross the border in that sector again. The Administration is working to expand interior repatriation to ensure that when those who violate the country's immigration laws are sent home, they stay home.

    - The Administration Is Ending The Practice Of "Catch And Release." Because detention facilities lack bed space, most non-Mexican illegal immigrants apprehended are released and directed to return for a court appearance. However, 75 percent fail to show. Last year, only 30,000 of the 160,000 non-Mexicans caught coming across our Southwest border were sent home. Addressing this problem, the President has signed legislation increasing the number of beds in detention facilities by more than 10 percent over the next year. The Federal government is also using "expedited removal" to detain, place into streamlined judicial proceedings, and deport non-Mexican illegal immigrants in an average of 32 days - almost three times faster than the usual procedure. Last year, more than 20,000 non-Mexicans caught crossing the border between Laredo and Tucson were deported using expedited removal. The use of expedited removal is now being expanded across the entire Southwest border. When illegal immigrants know they will be caught and sent home, they will be less likely to cross illegally in the first place.

- The Administration Is Taking Further Steps To Accelerate The Removal Process. The U.S. is pressing foreign governments to take back their citizens more promptly, while streamlining bureaucracy and increasing the number of flights carrying illegal immigrants home. Testing these steps, "Operation Texas Hold 'Em" along the Rio Grande Valley of the Texas Border recently resulted in Brazilian illegal immigration dropping by 90 percent in the Rio Grande Valley - and by 50 percent across the entire border. These efforts are helping change a policy of "catch and release" to a policy of "catch and return."

➢ Second, The Administration Will Work With Congress To Reform Immigration Laws: The President is seeking to eliminate senseless rules that require the government to release illegal immigrants if their home countries do not take them back in a set period of time. Among those the government has been forced to release are murderers, rapists, child molesters, and other violent criminals. The President is also working with Congress to address the cycle of endless litigation that clogs immigration courts, rewards illegal behavior, and delays justice for immigrants with legitimate claims. Lawsuits and red tape must not stand in the way of protecting the American people.

➢ Third, The Federal Government Will Act To Stop People From Illegally Crossing The Border In The First Place: The Administration is increasing manpower, technology, and infrastructure at the Nation's borders, and integrating these resources in innovative ways.

- Increasing Manpower. Since 2001, 1,900 Border Patrol agents have been added, and the President has signed legislation allowing the addition of another 1,000 agents in the year ahead. When the hiring is completed, the Border Patrol will have been enlarged by about 3,000 agents - from about 9,500 when the President took office to about 12,500 next year. This is an increase of more than 30 percent.

- Deploying New Technology. The Administration is giving Border Patrol agents the tools to expand their reach and effectiveness including unmanned aerial vehicles (UAVs) and infrared cameras. In Tucson, agents using UAVs to patrol the border have improved their interception of illegal immigrants and drugs on the border. Legislation signed by the President is providing $139 million to further upgrade technology and bring a more unified, systematic approach to border enforcement.

- Constructing Physical Barriers To Entry. The President has signed legislation providing $70 million to install and improve protective infrastructure across the border. In rural areas, the government is constructing new patrol roads to give agents better access to the border and new vehicle barriers to keep illegal immigrants from driving across. In urban areas, the government is expanding fencing to shut down human smuggling corridors. The Administration recently authorized the completion of a 14-mile barrier near San Diego. Once held up by litigation, this project is vital to helping border agents do their jobs and make those who live near the border more secure.

Comprehensive Immigration Reform Requires Improved Enforcement Of Immigration Laws Within The United States: Catching and deporting illegal immigrants along the border is only part of protecting the American people. Our immigration laws must be enforced throughout America.

- The Federal Government Is Improving Worksite Enforcement. The President has signed legislation that more than doubles the resources dedicated to worksite enforcement. The government is placing a special focus on enforcement at critical infrastructure. This year, Operation Rollback - the largest worksite enforcement case in American history resulted in the arrest of hundreds of illegal immigrants, criminal convictions against a dozen employers, and a multi-million dollar payment from one of America's largest businesses. Worksite enforcement is critical to the success of immigration reform.

  - To Help Businesses Comply With Immigration Laws, The Government Is Addressing Document Fraud. Even the most diligent employers find it difficult to spot forged employment documents and verify workers' legal status. So the Administration is expanding the Basic Pilot program enabling businesses to screen the employment eligibility of new hires against Federal records. Since 2001, this program has expanded from only six states to now being available nationwide. The Administration will work with Congress to continue to improve employment verification.

- The President Has Committed The Resources Necessary To Enforce Immigration Laws. Since 2001, the Administration has increased funding for interior enforcement by 44 percent; increased the number of immigration and customs investigators by 14 percent; and new funding will allow for an additional 400 immigration enforcement agents and 250 criminal investigators. These skilled officers are getting results. In Arizona alone, 2,300 people have been prosecuted for smuggling drugs, guns, and illegal immigrants across the border. Operation Community Shield has resulted in the arrest of nearly 1,400 illegal immigrant gang members - including hundreds of members of violent gangs like "MS-13." Since the creation of the Department of Homeland Security (DHS), agents have apprehended nearly 27,000 illegal immigrant fugitives.

As Part Of Comprehensive Immigration Reform, The President Has Proposed The Creation Of A New Temporary Worker Program. To match foreign workers with American employers for jobs that no American is willing to take, temporary workers will be able to register for legal status for a fixed time period and then be required to return home. This plan meets the needs of a growing economy, allows honest workers to provide for their families while respecting the law, and relieves pressure on the border. By reducing the flow of illegal immigrants, law enforcement can focus on those who mean this country harm. To improve worksite enforcement, the plan creates tamper-proof I.D. cards for every legal temporary worker.

- A Temporary Worker Program Would Not Provide Amnesty. The program does not create an automatic path to citizenship or provide amnesty. The President opposes amnesty because rewarding those who break the law would encourage more illegal entrants and increase pressure on the border. A Temporary Worker Program, by contrast, would promote legal immigration and decrease pressure on the border. The President supports increasing the annual number of green cards, but for the sake of justice and security, the President will not sign an immigration bill that includes amnesty.

By Reforming Immigration Laws, The United States Will Preserve The Promise Of America. Immigrants play a vital role in strengthening American democracy. This is a land in which foreigners who respect the laws are welcomed as contributors to American culture - not feared as threats. The United States has been strengthened by generations of immigrants who became Americans through patience, hard work, and assimilation. Like generations of immigrants that have come before them, every new citizen has an obligation to learn this Nation's customs and values. At the same time, America will fulfill its obligation to give each citizen a chance to realize the American dream. By enforcing immigration laws, the Federal government is protecting the promise of a tolerant, welcoming America and preserving opportunity for all.

SUBJECT: Advance Notification of BJS Publication

PURPOSE: To provide the Attorney General with advance copies and notification of the pending publication of Federal Criminal Justice Trends, 2003 (NCJ 205331), by Mark Motivans of BJS.

DISCUSSION: Federal Criminal Justice Trends, 2003 presents data on Federal criminal justice trends from 1994-2003. This report summarizes the activities of agencies at each stage of the Federal criminal case process. It includes 10-year trend statistics on the number arrested (with detail on drug offenses); number and disposition of suspects investigated by U.S. attorneys; number of persons detained prior to trial; number of defendants in cases filed, convicted, and sentenced; and number of offenders under Federal correctional supervision (incarceration, supervised release, probation, and parole). Highlights include the following:

• From 1994 to 2003 the number of suspects/defendants increased steadily across the stages of the Federal criminal justice system:

Stage	Number of suspects/ defendants processed 1994	2003
Suspects investigated	99,251	130,078
Suspects arrested and booked	80,730	131,064
Defendants charged	62,327	92,085
Defendants convicted	50,701	75,805
Defendants sentenced to prison	33,022	57,629

• Growth in immigration and weapons offenders
The 10-year average annual increase was greatest for immigration (ranging from 14% for arrests to 25% for prison sentences imposed) and weapon offenses (ranging from 10% for prosecution to 11% for matters investigated by U.S. attorneys).

• Southwest United States produced a disproportionate share of suspects and defendants processed
Five of 94 Federal judicial districts (Southern District of California, District of Arizona, District of New Mexico and Southern and Western Districts of Texas) comprised 31% of all suspects arrested and booked, 19% of suspects investigated, 23% of defendants in cases filed in U.S. district court, and 28% of offenders sentenced to prison (1994-2003).

• Greater likelihood of suspects prosecuted, defendants convicted, and offenders sentenced to prison
The percent of suspects prosecuted (of matters concluded by U.S. attorneys) increased from 54% in 1994 to 62% in 2003.

DISSEMINATION: The text and data tabulations will be made available on the Internet for instantaneous dissemination at the time of the press release. When printed, this report will be distributed to criminal justice practitioners, policymakers, and others who have indicated an interest in this subject. We have consulted with the OJP Office of Communications, and they have made preliminary plans to issue a press release.

TIMETABLE: The press release is anticipated for Sunday, August 27, 2006, at 4:30 p.m. EDT. BJS will begin distributing this publication at that time.

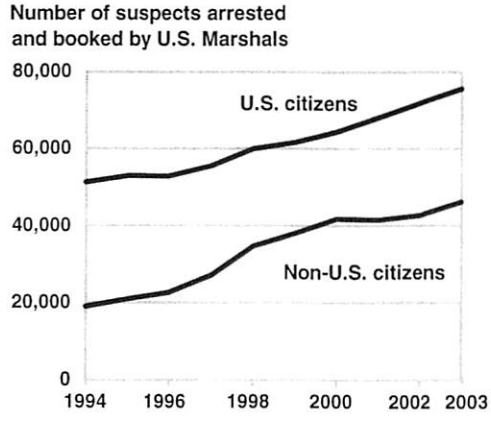
Q & A's for Federal Criminal Justice Trends, 2003

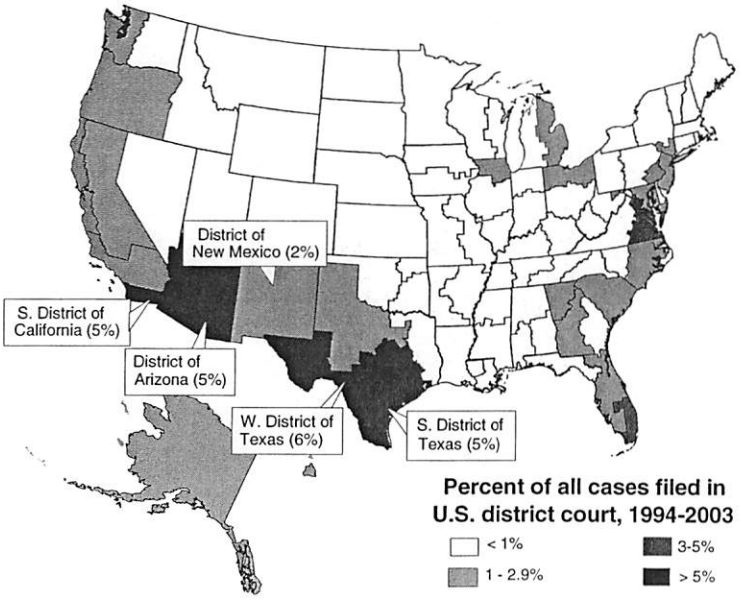
Federal Criminal Justice Trends, 2003 is the first in a new series designed to track trends in the Federal justice system. BJS uses data received from eight Federal justice agencies to describe the enforcement of several thousand Federal statutes in the U.S. Criminal Code. Publication of this report, while not mandated by statute, serves as a uniform reference volume on Federal criminal case processing trends.



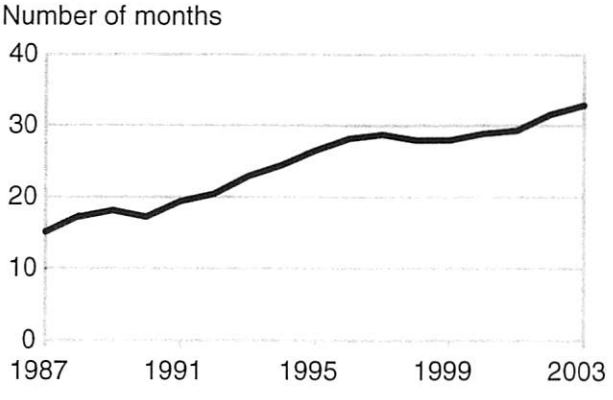
Q. What are significant findings from this report?

A. The number of suspects/defendants processed in the Federal criminal justice system increased to record levels. Over 130,000 suspects were investigated by U.S. attorneys in 2003 up from 99,000 in 1994. Federal legislation and Justice's enforcement initiatives addressing the problem of illegal immigration resulted in immigration being the offense with the greatest 10-year average increase across case processing stages (14% average yearly increase in immigration arrests and 25% increase in prison sentences imposed). The number of drug offenders sentenced to prison increased a yearly average of 6% and weapon offenders increased 10% over this period.

From 1994-2003 suspects had a greater likelihood of being prosecuted, defendants convicted, and offenders sentenced to prison.



The number of non-U.S. citizens in the Federal criminal justice system steadily increased from 1994-2003. Thirty-eight percent of suspects arrested and booked by the U.S. Marshals Service (USMS) in 2003 were non-citizens compared to 27% in 1994. Of the 152,459 prisoners in custody of the Federal Bureau of Prisons, 28% were non-U.S. citizens.



Q: How were Federal criminal cases distributed across the U.S. over this period?
A: From 1994-2003 a notable share of suspects and defendants were processed in the Southwest. Five Federal judicial districts (Southern District of California, District of Arizona, District of New Mexico and Southern and Western Districts of Texas) comprised 31% of all suspects arrested and booked, 20% of suspects investigated, 23% of defendants in cases filed in U.S. district court, and 28% of offenders sentenced to prison (1994-2003).

Five out of 94 Federal judicial districts comprised 23% of all criminal cases filed in U.S. district court from 1994-2003

Q. How much time did inmates released from prison serve (on average)?
A: During 2003, 40,780 prisoners were released for the first time from Federal prison after commitment by a U.S. district court. The average time served for all offenses was 33 months. Average time served by Federal offenders increased from 25 months for those released in 1994 to 33 months for offenders released in 2003.

SUBJECT: Advance Notification of BJS Publication

PURPOSE: To provide the Attorney General with advance copies and notification of the pending publication of Prosecutors in State Courts, 2005 (NCJ 213799), by Steven W. Perry of BJS.

DISCUSSION: Prosecutors in State Courts, 2005 presents findings from the 2005 National Survey of Prosecutors, the latest in a series of data collections from among the Nation's 2,300 State court prosecutors' offices that tried felony cases in State courts of general jurisdiction. This study provides information on the number of staff, annual budget, and felony cases closed for each office. Information is also available on the use of DNA evidence, computer-related crimes, and terrorism cases prosecuted. Other survey data include special categories of felony offenses prosecuted, types of non-felony cases handled, number of felony convictions, number of juvenile cases proceeded against in criminal court, and work-related threats or assaults against office staff. Highlights include the following:

• At least two-thirds of the State court prosecutors had litigated a computer-related crime such as credit card fraud (80%), identity theft (69%), or transmission of child pornography (67%).

• Nearly all the prosecutors' offices (98%) reported their State had a domestic violence statute; 28% of the offices maintained a domestic violence prosecution unit.

• A quarter (24%) of the offices participated in a State or local task force for homeland security; one-third reported an office member attended training on homeland security issues.

• Most prosecutors (95%) relied on State operated forensic laboratories to perform DNA analysis, with about a third (34%) also using privately operated DNA labs.

• Two-thirds of prosecutors' offices had prosecuted a juvenile case in criminal court during 2005. A third of the offices had a designated attorney for these special cases.

• In 2005, nearly 40% of the prosecutors considered their office a community prosecution site actively involving law enforcement and the community to improve public safety.

COORDINATION: The Bureau of Justice Statistics coordinated with the following entities, who performed data collection and processing, pre-testing, non-response, and/or reviewed the report: the National Opinion Research Center (NORC) at the University of Chicago, the National District Attorneys Association (NDAA), the Prosecutor Coordinator Offices in each State, and the Office of Research & Evaluation for the American Prosecutors Research Institute.

DISSEMINATION: The text and data tabulations will be made available on the Internet for instantaneous dissemination upon release. When printed, this report will be distributed to criminal justice practitioners, policymakers, and others who have indicated an interest in this subject.

TIMETABLE: BJS will make this publication available in late July, in preparation for the National District Attorneys Association Summer Conference in Santa Fe, New Mexico, July 30 – August 2, 2006.

SUBJECT: Advance Notification of BJS Publication

PURPOSE: To provide the Attorney General with advance copies and notification of the pending publication of (NCJ 212750), by Brian Reaves of BJS.

DISCUSSION: Federal Law Enforcement Officers, 2004 reports the results of a biennial census of Federal agencies employing personnel with arrest and firearms authority. Using agency classifications, the report presents the number of officers working in the areas of police response and patrol, criminal investigation and enforcement, inspections, security and protection, court operations, and corrections, by agency and State, as of September 2004. Data on gender and race of officers are also included. Highlights include the following:

- As of September 2004, about 3 in 4 Federal law enforcement officers working outside the Armed Forces were employed within the Department of Homeland Security or the Department of Justice.

- Federal officers' duties included criminal investigation (38%), police response and patrol (21%), corrections and detention (16%), inspections (16%), court operations (5%), and security and protection (4%).

• The largest employers of Federal officers were U.S. Customs and Border Protection (CBP) (27,705), the Federal Bureau of Prisons (15,214), the FBI (12,242), and U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) (10,399). Ten other agencies employed at least 1,000 officers.

• The combined officer employment of CBP and ICE in 2004 was 21% greater than the comparable combined totals of the INS, U.S. Customs Service, and Federal Protective Service in 2002.

• Women accounted for 16% of Federal officers in 2004. A third of Federal officers were members of a racial or ethnic minority in 2004. This included 17.7% who were Hispanic or Latino, and 11.4% who were black or African American.

• About half of the Federal officers in the U.S. were employed in Texas (14,633), California (13,365), the District of Columbia (9,201), New York (8,159), or Florida (6,627). New Hampshire and Delaware, with 112 each, had the fewest Federal officers.

• Nationwide, there were 36 Federal officers per 100,000 residents. Outside the District of Columbia, which had 1,662 per 100,000, State ratios ranged from 90 per 100,000 in Arizona to 7 per 100,000 in Iowa.

COORDINATION: As in the previous versions of this report for 1996, 1998, 2000, and 2002, the data are the result of a cooperative effort involving BJS and staff in all Federal agencies employing personnel with arrest and firearms authority. Within the Department of Justice, this included the BOP, FBI, DEA, USMS, ATF, and IG Office.

DISSEMINATION: The text and data tabulations will be made available on the Internet for instantaneous dissemination upon release. When printed, this report will be distributed to criminal justice practitioners, policymakers, and others who have indicated an interest in this subject.

TIMETABLE: BJS will make this publication available 30 days from the date of this memorandum.

Federal Law Enforcement Officers, 2004

Every two years the Bureau of Justice Statistics conducts a census of Federal law enforcement officers. The census provides basic information about Federal officers, including their employing agency, gender, race, ethnicity, primary job function, and the State in which they primarily perform their duties. The most recent census collected data for the reference date of September 30, 2004.

Q. Which agencies does the BJS Census cover?
A. The 2004 Census of Federal Law Enforcement Officers covers 65 Federal agencies employing full-time personnel with the authority to make arrests and carry a firearm. The total includes 27 offices of inspector general. Because of limitations on the availability of data for some agencies, the BJS census does not include the Armed Forces (Army, Navy, Air Force, Marines, and Coast Guard), the Federal Air Marshals (in the Department of Homeland Security), or the Central Intelligence Agency.

Q. Is the number of Federal law enforcement officers increasing?
A. The Federal agencies included in the 2004 BJS Census of Federal Law Enforcement Officers, collectively employed about 105,000 officers as of September 2004. This was about 13% more than in 2002.

Q. What are the duties of Federal law enforcement officers?
A. According to the 2004 Census, 38% primarily performed duties related to criminal investigation and enforcement, and 21% provided patrol and response services. Corrections and detention-related duties were performed by 16% of officers, and another 16% performed inspections duties related to customs and immigration laws.

Q. Which Federal agency employs the most officers?
A. As of September 2004, U.S. Customs and Border Protection in the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) was the largest agency with 27,705 personnel authorized to make arrests and carry firearms in the 50 States and the District of Columbia. Other agencies with at least 10,000 officers included two Justice Department agencies - the Federal Bureau of Prisons (15,214) and the FBI (12,242) - and another DHS agency, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (10,399).

Q. What is the representation of women and minorities among Federal officers?
A. In 2004, women accounted for about a sixth of Federal officers. A third were members of a racial or ethnic minority. This included about 18% who were Hispanic or Latino, and 11% who were black or African American.

Q. Relative to the population, how many Federal officers are there? Which States have the most officers? Which States have the fewest?
A. Nationwide there were 36 Federal officers with arrest and firearm authority for every 100,000 U.S. residents. Outside the District of Columbia which had 1,662 officers per 100,000 residents, State ratios ranged from 90 per 100,000 in Arizona, to 7 per 100,000 in Iowa. In actual numbers Texas (14,633) and California (13,365) had the most Federal officers while New Hampshire and Delaware, with 112 each, had the fewest.

SUBJECT: Advance Notification of BJS Publication

PURPOSE: To provide the Attorney General with advance copies and notification of the pending publication of Violent Felons in Large Urban Counties (NCJ 205289), by Brian Reaves of BJS.

DISCUSSION: Violent Felons in Large Urban Counties presents data collected from a representative sample of felony cases that resulted in a felony conviction for a violent offense in 40 of the Nation's 75 largest counties. The study tracks cases for up to 1 year from the date of filing through final disposition. Defendants convicted of murder, rape, robbery, assault or other violent felonies are described in terms of demographic characteristics (gender, race, Hispanic origin, age), prior arrests and convictions, criminal justice status at time of arrest, type of pretrial release or detention, type of adjudication, and sentence received. Highlights include the following:

- From 1990 to 2002, 18% of felony convictions in the 75 largest counties were for violent offenses, including 7% for assault and 6% for robbery.

• Six percent of those convicted of violent felonies were under age 18, and 25% were under age 21. Ten percent of murderers were under 18, and 30% were under 21.

• Thirty-six percent of violent felons had an active criminal justice status at the time of their arrest. This included 18% on probation, 12% on release pending disposition of a prior case, and 7% on parole.

• Seventy percent of violent felons had a prior arrest record, and 57% had at least one prior arrest for a felony. Sixty-seven percent of murderers and 73% of those convicted of robbery or assault had an arrest record.

• A majority (56%) of violent felons had a prior conviction record. Thirty-eight percent had a prior felony conviction and 15% had a previous conviction for a violent felony.

• Forty-one percent of murder convictions occurred at a trial rather than through a guilty plea. Trials accounted for 12% of rape and robbery convictions and 11% of assault convictions.

• Eighty-one percent of violent felons were sentenced to incarceration with 50% going to prison and 31% to jail. Nineteen percent received a probation term without incarceration.

• Median prison sentences received included a maximum of 240 months for murder, 120 months for rape, 60 months for robbery, and 48 months for other violent felonies.

DISSEMINATION: The text and data tabulations will be made available on the Internet for instantaneous dissemination at the time of the press release. When printed, this report will be distributed to criminal justice practitioners, policymakers, and others who have indicated an interest in this subject. We have consulted with the OJP Office of Communications, and they have made preliminary plans to issue a press release.

TIMETABLE: The press release is anticipated for Sunday, August 6, 2006, at 4:30 p.m. EDT. BJS will begin distributing this publication at that time.

Violent Felons in Large Urban Counties

Q. What violent offenders does this report cover?

A. The report presents analyses covering a sample of 9,000 convicted violent felons representing 33,000 cases from State courts in the 75 largest counties. These cases were selected during seven separate studies conducted in even-numbered years from 1990 through 2002. A sample of felony cases filed during the month of May was selected in each of these years. They were included in the analyses as long as they resulted in the defendant being convicted of a violent felony.

Q. What proportion of violent crimes are committed by youthful offenders?

A. Six percent of violent felons in the 75 largest counties were under the age of 18, and 25% were under the age of 21. Ten percent of murderers were under the age of 18, and 30% were under 21.

Q. Is it true that many violent crimes are committed by repeat offenders?

A. Thirty-six percent of violent felons had an active criminal justice status at the time of their arrest. This included 18% on probation, 12% on release pending disposition of a prior case, and 7% on parole. Seventy percent had a prior arrest record, and 56% had a conviction record. Thirty-eight percent had at least 1 prior felony conviction, and 15% had been previously convicted of a violent felony.

Q. Do persons convicted of a violent felony typically receive a prison sentence?

A. Overall, 50% of those convicted of a violent felony received a prison sentence, and another 31% received a jail sentence. Nearly all (96%) murderers were sentenced to prison. A majority of those convicted of robbery (69%) or rape (62%) were sentenced to prison as well. About a fifth of rape and robbery sentences were to jail. For those convicted of felony assault, equal percentages (38%) were sentenced to prison and jail. Nearly all violent felons not sentenced to incarceration received a probation term.

Q. How long are the prison sentences for violent felons?

A. The median sentence length was 20 years for murderers, 10 years for rape, 5 years for robbery, and 4 years for assault.

PURPOSE: To provide the Attorney General with advance copies and notification of the pending publication of Sexual Violence Reported by Correctional Authorities, 2005 (NCJ 214646), by Allen Beck and Paige Harrison of BJS.

DISCUSSION: Sexual Violence Reported by Correctional Authorities, 2005 presents data from the Survey on Sexual Violence, 2005, an administrative records collection of incidents of inmate-on-inmate and staff-on-inmate sexual violence reported to correctional authorities. The report provides counts of sexual violence by type and includes tables on reporting capabilities, how investigations are handled, and characteristics of victims and perpetrators of sexual violence. In 2005, the survey was expanded to collect detailed information on substantiated incidents, including the circumstances surrounding each incident, characteristics of victims and perpetrators, the type of pressure or coercion, victim injuries, sanctions imposed, and victim assistance. The appendix tables include counts of sexual violence, by type, for the 1,867 facilities included in the survey. The report also includes an update on BJS activities related to implementation of the data collections required under the Prison Rape Elimination Act of 2003 (Public Law 108-79). Highlights include the following:

• 6,241 allegations of sexual violence in prison and jail reported in 2005, up from 5,386 in 2004. 38% of allegations involved staff sexual misconduct; 35%, inmate-on-inmate nonconsensual sexual acts; 17%, staff sexual harassment; and 10%, abusive sexual contact.

• Correctional authorities reported 2.83 allegations of sexual violence per 1,000 inmates in 2005, up from 2.46 in 2004.

• Correctional authorities substantiated 885 incidents of sexual violence in 2005, 15% of completed investigations. There were an estimated 0.40 substantiated incidents of sexual violence per 1,000 inmates in 2005, down from the 0.55 recorded in 2004.

• Based on completed investigations only, 37% of allegations of staff sexual misconduct in local jails and 15% in State prisons were substantiated.

• Half of inmate-on-inmate sexual violence involved physical force or threat of force; two-thirds of staff misconduct was romantic. In prisons 67% of the victims involved in staff sexual misconduct were male, while 62% of the perpetrators were female. In jails 78% of victims of staff sexual misconduct were female; 87% of the perpetrators, male.

• Staff were arrested or prosecuted in 45% of substantiated incidents of staff sexual misconduct; discharged, fired or resigned in 82%.

COORDINATION: The Census Bureau of the U.S. Department of Commerce assisted with data collection and processing of the survey.

DISSEMINATION: The text and data tabulations will be made available on the Internet for instantaneous dissemination at the time of the press release. Sexual Violence Reported by Correctional Authorities, 2005

Presents data from the Survey on Sexual Violence, 2005, an administrative records collection of incidents of inmate-on-inmate and staff-on-inmate sexual violence reported to correctional authorities. The report provides counts of sexual violence in all State prison systems, the Federal prison system, and a sample of privately-operated and local jail facilities, by type of violence. The 2005 survey also collected individual level data on substantiated incidents, which expands our knowledge on the characteristics of the victims, perpetrators, and circumstances of sexual assault incidents. Finally, the report also includes an update on activities related to implementation of the data collections required under the Prison Rape Elimination Act of 2003 (Public Law 108-79). The publication of this report is mandated by statute and is prepared on June 30 of each year. Data on sexual violence as reported to the juvenile justice authorities will be published later this year.

1. What is the Prison Rape Elimination Act of 2003?

- The Prison Rape Elimination Act of 2003 was signed into law on September 4, 2003, by President George W. Bush. The Act establishes a zero-tolerance policy for inmate-on-inmate and staff-on-inmate sexual violence in correctional facilities.
- Under the Act, the Bureau of Justice Statistics (BJS) is required to conduct an annual data collection to measure the incidence and prevalence of sexual violence in at least 10% of the Nation's 5,220 adult correctional facilities and 3,470 juvenile facilities. This includes State and Federal prisons, local jails, private adult correctional facilities, jails in Indian Country, facilities operated by the U.S. Military or by the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, State juvenile facilities, and local and private juvenile facilities.
- BJS is required to submit a report to Congress on June 30 of each year on the activities related to the Act for the preceding year and to provide a listing of institutions ranked according to the incidence of sexual violence.

2. How is sexual violence measured?

- Incidents of inmate-on-inmate sexual violence were separated into two categories: nonconsensual sexual acts and abusive sexual contacts. Incidents of staff-on-inmate sexual violence were categorized into staff sexual misconduct and staff sexual harassment.
- Most correctional systems and facilities were able to report information on the most serious incidents of sexual violence.
- Additional information was collected on substantiated incidents, including victim and perpetrator characteristics, time and place of incident, and actions taken following the report.

3. How extensive is sexual violence in the Nation's correctional facilities?

- During 2005 an estimated 6,241 allegations of sexual violence were reported by correctional authorities -- the equivalent of 2.8 allegations per 1,000 inmates, up from 2.5 per 1,000 inmates in prison, jails, and other adult correctional facilities in 2004.
- State and Federal prison systems reported 74% of all allegations; local jails, 22%.
- Approximately 38% of the reported allegations of sexual violence involved staff-on-inmate sexual misconduct; 35% involved inmate-on-inmate nonconsensual sexual acts; 17% staff sexual harassment of inmates; and 10% inmate-on-inmate abusive sexual contacts.

4. What additional information is learned from the 2005 survey?

- Correctional authorities substantiated 885 incidents of sexual violence in 2005, 15% of completed investigations.
- Relative to the number of inmates, there were 0.40 substantiated incidents of sexual violence per 1,000 inmates reported in 2005, down from 0.55 per 1,000 inmates in adult facilities in 2004.
- Half of inmate-on-inmate incidents of sexual violence involved physical force or threat of force.
- In more than two-thirds of inmate-on-inmate incidents, the sexual violence occurred in the victim's cell or living area. In only 20% of the incidents did the violence occur in a common area, such as a shower or dayroom.
- Victims received physical injuries in 15% of substantiated incidents of inmate-on-inmate sexual violence. Victims received medical attention, counseling or mental health treatment in two-thirds of the incidents of nonconsensual sexual acts.
- Half of the victims of nonconsensual sexual acts were placed in protective custody or administrative segregation.
- In half of the incidents of inmate-on-inmate sexual violence, the perpetrators were arrested or referred for prosecution; in more than two-thirds of the incidents, the perpetrator was placed in solitary confinement.

5. What is learned about staff sexual misconduct and harassment in prisons and jails?

- Two-thirds of incidents of staff sexual misconduct with inmates were reported to be romantic in nature. Fewer than 15% of the substantiated incidents involved physical force, abuse of power or pressure by staff.
- In State prison and Federal prisons 67% of the victims of staff misconduct were male; while 62% of the perpetrators were female. In local jails 78% of the victims were female; 87% of the perpetrators, male.
- Most substantiated incidents of staff sexual misconduct and harassment involved correctional officers (69%). About 13% of the incidents involved contract employees or vendors.
- Nearly 90% of the perpetrators of staff misconduct were arrested, referred for prosecution or discharged.
- In incidents involving a romantic relationship between inmate and staff, more than half of the inmates were either transferred to another facility or placed in administrative segregation.

6. When will the other PREA data collections be implemented?

- The National Inmate Survey of Sexual Assault, an ACASI self-report instrument designed for adult prisons and jails, has completed the testing stage, and BJS and RTI staff are analyzing the results (report of pretest results will be issued in September). National implementation in 120 prisons and 330 jails, with a yield of 60,000 interviews, will begin in November, 2006. Results from the survey will be included in the report to Congress on June 30, 2007.
- The National Survey of Sexual Assault in Juvenile Facilities, an ACASI self-report instrument designed for youth, is currently undergoing cognitive testing and will be fully tested in 10 facilities with up to 600 youth is planned for September 2006. Full national implementation in up to 180 juvenile facilities (with 14,000 adjudicated youth) is expected in 2007.

- The National Survey of Sexual Assault Reported by Former Inmates, an ACASI self-report instrument designed for former inmates under active supervision, will undergo pretesting in 10-20 parole offices in fall 2006. National implementation is expected to occur in 285 parole offices (with up to 11,500 interviews) in 2007.
- National Prison Rape Surveillance Project, a collection using medical indicators as an additional measure of sexual violence, is currently being developed in partnership with the National Institute of Justice and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

SUBJECT: Advance Notification of an OJJDP Publication

PURPOSE: To provide you with advance copies and notification of the pending release of National Evaluation of the Title V Community Prevention Grants Program (Online Report) (NCJ 212214).

DISCUSSION: This Online Report presents the findings from a multiyear, multisite national evaluation of the Title V Community Prevention Grants Program. Through Title V, OJJDP provides communities with funding and a guiding framework for developing and implementing comprehensive juvenile delinquency prevention plans that meet their unique circumstances and risk conditions.

This Report presents the experiences of 11 communities in 6 states that implemented the basic principles of the Community Prevention Grants Program. Specifically, the Report examines how the program affected these communities, including the benefits they received and the challenges they encountered. It also analyzes the national evaluation team's efforts to design and implement a national assessment that balanced the information needs of the federal government with the evaluation capacity of local Title V communities.

Talking Points for National Evaluation of the Title V
Community Prevention Grants Program
(OJJDP Online Report)

Recognizing that community-based programs and local involvement are critical components of delinquency prevention efforts, OJJDP provides communities with funding and a guiding framework for developing and implementing comprehensive delinquency prevention plans. For more than a decade, OJJDP's Title V Community Prevention Grants Program has helped communities prevent delinquency and improve the lives of youth and their families.

Beginning in 1998, OJJDP undertook a multiyear, multijurisdictional evaluation of the Community Prevention Grants Program to examine the viability and effectiveness of its delinquency prevention model. Based on input from national experts in designing and conducting evaluations of comprehensive program initiatives, the evaluation tests the key assumptions on which the program model rests.

This Report presents the experiences of 11 communities in 6 states that implemented the basic principles of the Community Prevention Grants Program. Specifically, the Report examines how the program affected these communities, including the benefits they received and the challenges they encountered. Evaluation findings include the following:

- Title V means different things to different communities. For some communities, it means communitywide systems change; for others, it means implementation of one or more specific prevention programs. These differences can be attributed to whether the community was previously exposed to comprehensive prevention planning at the time it was introduced to the Title V model.

- A reasonable plan generally means communities are trying to affect no more than three risk factors and are implementing no more than two or three prevention strategies.

- Having subscribed to "program first" thinking for years, some local prevention policy board members were reluctant to embrace a more comprehensive planning model that emphasized "assessment first, program planning later."

- Because the Title V model is complex, especially for communities with little experience with collaborative, communitywide prevention efforts, it is important to encourage local leaders to start small. Over time, after communities have reassessed their local risk and protective factors, they can modify or enhance existing efforts or put new programs and strategies in place.

- Most of the communities struggled to develop and implement local evaluation plans. Suggestions for improving evaluation efforts include: emphasizing program evaluation and risk-factor tracking; building state-level evaluation capacity to monitor and support local-level evaluation; mandating evaluation and set-aside funds to support it; and requiring the use of evidence-based programs.

Since the inception of the Title V Community Prevention Grants Program in 1992, overall, progress has been made. Communities have become better at collaborating, assessing their local needs, identifying appropriate strategies, and institutionalizing and evaluating local efforts.

The national evaluation described in this Report provides a framework for understanding both the process and progress of the Title V Program. As one of the nation's first comprehensive, community-based prevention initiatives, Title V offers a unique opportunity for OJJDP and others in the field of delinquency prevention to observe communities nationwide as they attempt to translate theory into practice. Findings from the national evaluation have helped OJJDP refine the Title V model.

The national evaluation provided opportunities to learn firsthand about the challenges of evaluating comprehensive, community-based initiatives like Title V. As the evaluation progressed, so did other national evaluations of comprehensive, community-based initiatives. In combination, these national evaluation team experiences can help inform future national evaluations of programs like Title V by identifying what works in terms of methodology, design, and data collection activities and how best to support communities to participate fully in large evaluation projects.

Blaming the messenger

There is some good news — and a lot of bad news — on the racial profiling front.

But since the Justice Department official responsible for reporting all the news wanted to tell America the bad news, the Bush administration has not only tried to hide the news, but also kill the messenger.

The good news is that a study by the U.S. Department of Justice's Bureau of Justice Statistics, released in April, shows that according to a national study of racial profiling trends, African Americans, Hispanics and Whites are stopped by police in traffic situations in about the same numbers on the nation's highways.

The study — based on routines of the police and thus not subject to the self-selection that might come from police agencies doctoring their own records of police stops — gives some credence to police officials who have argued that "racial profiling" — the pattern of stopping motorists based on nothing more than their minority status — might not be as pronounced as many have feared.

But the bad news in the study is bad news, so despite the disturbing information in a carefully researched, well-written and meticulous report, the Department of Justice refused to issue a press release that comes out after a study is released. The word dumped into the DOJ Web site, without any of the fanfare that would let the public know of this important research.

Those statistics are cause for concern. Why would African Americans and Hispanics be three times more likely to have their vehicles searched than Whites — given the same probability of being stopped? And why are they more likely to be arrested — in the circumstances surrounding likely to report having force used against them? Greenfeld's explanation is that there was no intent to be this because African Americans and Hispanics are being subjected to greater levels of scrutiny, based on racial profiles. These are questions that should be asked — and that the Justice Department should aggressively answer.

But the Department of Justice, rather than trumpeting the study, has attempted to bury it. And when the head of the Bureau of Justice Statistics, Lawrence Greenfeld, resisted, he was ousted. Scientists at the Environmental Protection Agency struggled to keep efforts to minimize the dangers of global warming from being buried. And agency leaders who have challenged the handling of intelligence about Iraq's weapons of mass destruction have found their careers derailed.

Racial profiling is an important issue today, and the center of discussions as to how we will confront the global war on terror, on our own shores. That's why we need the best information the government can produce — and its widest dissemination.

Sen. Edward Kennedy, who is working on profiling legislation, and Sen. Joseph Biden, who serves on the Senate Judiciary Committee, should express their concerns to the president and the Justice Department about the handling of Greenfeld — and the dissemination of information on racial profiling.

Just because the administration does not like the message, it should not blame the messenger.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

August 25, 2005

Honorable Alberto Gonzales
Attorney General
Department of Justice
950 Pennsylvania Avenue, NW
Washington DC 20530

Dear Attorney General Gonzales:

We are writing to express our deep concern over recent reports in the New York Times and the Washington Post indicating that the Director of the Bureau of Justice Statistics ("BJS"), Lawrence A. Greenfeld, was demoted for insisting that data on aggressive police treatment of blacks and Hispanics be included in a press release announcing the results of a racial profiling and traffic stop study. We ask that you immediately reinstate Lawrence A. Greenfeld as the director of BJS and refer this matter to the Inspector General for a thorough investigation.

We are particularly troubled by reports that senior political officials at the Department of Justice ("DOJ") sought to include conclusions in a proposed press release relating to data showing that black and Hispanic drivers were equally likely to be stopped by the police as were white drivers, while eliminating any discussion of data showing that, once stopped, police officers acted in a more aggressive manner toward black and Hispanic drivers. Mr. Greenfeld apparently sought to include both pieces of relevant information in the press release. Failure to do so would have led to an incomplete and inaccurate description of the results of this critical study.

President Bush called for an end to racial profiling in 2001, and we have introduced comprehensive legislation in the United States Congress to achieve that goal. We strongly support the President's call for an end to racial profiling and applaud DOJ for undertaking this study on racial profiling and traffic stops. We are eager to work with you to achieve the President's goal, but we are troubled by the message that this episode sends about the Department's commitment to it.

As you know, racial profiling is a crucial issue for all Americans. When this kind of bias finds a home in the enforcement of the very laws meant to protect us and bind us together, it literally rips our communities apart. While the vast majority of law enforcement officers discharge their duties without bias, it is unacceptable for even one police officer to fail in this regard. The reliance by some law enforcement agents on race, ethnicity, national origin or religion in deciding who to target for criminal investigations violates our nation's basic constitutional commitment to equal justice under the law. As such, we need to be vigilant in our efforts to end racial profiling.

Although whites, blacks, and Hispanics were stopped by the police at the same rate, the BJS study revealed deep racial disparities in the treatment of black and Hispanic drivers following the initial stop. The study indicated that blacks and Hispanics were much more likely to be arrested than whites, Hispanics were much more likely to be ticketed than blacks or whites, blacks and Hispanics were much more likely to report the use or threatened use of force by a police officer, blacks and Hispanics were much more likely to be handcuffed than whites, and blacks and Hispanics were much more likely to have their vehicles searched than whites.

It is essential that DOJ be forthcoming about these troubling statistics. We strongly believe that such data collection and analysis is the only means through which we can understand and confront the insidious problem of racial profiling. Transparent and accurate statistics also represent the only means through which we can judge our progress in our continuing effort to end racial profiling.

The integrity and independence of statistical studies that inform the drafting and enforcement of our nation's laws cannot be overstated. While individuals may disagree about particular interpretations of a statistical study, there can be no doubt that all of the data and all of the statistical conclusions must be completely transparent. It is likewise essential that all data and statistical conclusions be free from political manipulation. As such, BJS must maintain a level of independence and integrity beyond that found in most other sections of DOJ.

Thank you for your attention to this important matter. Again, we request that you immediately reinstate Lawrence A. Greenfeld as the director of BJS and refer this matter to the Inspector General for investigation.

Sincerely,

Washington, DC 20530-0001

Dear Mr. McNulty:

The Council of Institutional Investors, an association of more than 140 corporate, public and union pension funds with more than $3 trillion in pension assets, is writing to invite you to deliver a keynote address at the Council's semi-annual meeting on Thursday, March 30 and Friday, March 31, 2006, at the Loews L'Enfant Plaza in Washington, DC.

The theme of the meeting is "New Environment, New Faces," and the 500-plus attendees would value your insights on the Justice Department's work prosecuting white collar corporate crime. The Council believes the Department's work has played an integral role rebuilding the confidence of investors in the US markets following the scandals of the past five years.

As you know, Council members represent long-term patient capital. They have a significant stake in the U.S. capital markets, and as a result, they have suffered tremendous losses from the recent corporate scandals. They look to companies to institute the strongest systems of checks and balances possible and to the Department of Justice to hold wrongdoers accountable.

Our mutual friend Assistant Attorney General Neil Gorsuch—who was outside counsel to the Council—will vouch for the Council's reputation and credentials. I hope you can participate at this important event, and I look forward to hearing from you. Please contact me with any questions.

Sincerely,

Response to

CONCLUSION 31

ABOUT WLF'S LEGAL STUDIES DIVISION

The Washington Legal Foundation (WLF) established its Legal Studies Division to address cutting-edge legal issues by producing and distributing substantive, credible publications targeted at educating policy makers, the media, and other key legal policy outlets.

Washington is full of policy centers of one stripe or another. But WLF's Legal Studies Division has deliberately adopted a unique approach that sets it apart from other organizations.

First, the Legal Studies Division deals almost exclusively with legal policy questions as they relate to the principles of free enterprise, legal and judicial restraint, and America's economic and national security.

Second, its publications focus on a highly select legal policy-making audience. Legal Studies aggressively markets its publications to federal and state judges and their clerks; members of the United States Congress and their legal staffs; government attorneys; business leaders and corporate general counsel; law school professors and students; influential legal journalists; and major print and media commentators.

Third, Legal Studies possesses the flexibility and credibility to involve talented individuals from all walks of life — from law students and professors to sitting federal judges and senior partners in established law firms — in its work.

The key to WLF's Legal Studies publications is the timely production of a variety of readable and challenging commentaries with a distinctly common-sense viewpoint rarely reflected in academic law reviews or specialized legal trade journals. The publication formats include the provocative COUNSEL'S ADVISORY, topical LEGAL OPINION LETTERS, concise LEGAL BACKGROUNDERS on emerging issues, in-depth WORKING PAPERS, useful and practical CONTEMPORARY LEGAL NOTES, interactive CONVERSATIONS WITH, law review-length MONOGRAPHS, and occasional books.

WLF's LEGAL OPINION LETTERS and LEGAL BACKGROUNDERS appear on the LEXIS/NEXIS® online information service under the filename "WLF" or can be visited at the Washington Legal Foundation's website at www.wlf.org.

To receive information about previous WLF publications, contact Glenn Lammi, Chief Counsel, Legal Studies Division, Washington Legal Foundation, 2009 Massachusetts Avenue, NW, Washington, D.C. 20036, (202) 588-0302. SETTLEMENTS IN SECURITIES FRAUD CLASS ACTIONS: IMPROVING INVESTOR PROTECTION by

INTRODUCTION

In 1941, Harry Kalven, Jr. and Maurice Rosenfield suggested a new use for class action lawsuits based on the emerging marketplace for publicly traded securities.[1] Kalven and Rosenfield argued that the securities markets had become so complex that investors had little incentive to seek remedies under the Securities Act because the cost of prosecuting a claim far surpassed the expected recovery.[2] To remedy this problem, the authors proposed using civil class actions to police abuses in the securities markets – a theory that would later be dubbed the "private attorney general."[3] The

[3]The term was coined by Judge Jerome Frank of the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. See Associated Indus. of New York State, Inc. v. Ickes, 134 F.2d 694, 704 (2d Cir. 1943) ("[T]here is nothing constitutionally prohibiting Congress from empowering any person, official or not, to institute a proceeding involving such a controversy, even if the sole purpose is to vindicate the public interest. Such persons, so authorized, are, so to speak, private Attorney Generals."). For a discussion of the rise of private enforcement actions under federal regulatory current class action provision codified in Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23 embodies Kalven's and Rosenfield's idea that civil class action suits could empower individual consumer redress while simultaneously ensuring enforcement of the federal securities laws.[4]

While securities class actions have offered some of the social benefits Kalven and Rosenfield envisioned, experience has shown that, like many other well-intended social experiments, they are not exempt from the law of unintended consequences, having brought with them vast social costs never imagined by their early promoters. Today, economic incentives unique to securities litigation encourage class action lawyers to bring meritless claims and prompt corporate defendants to pay dearly to settle such claims. These same incentives operate to encourage significant attorneys' fee awards even in cases where class members receive little meaningful compensation. And the problem is widespread. Recent studies conclude that, over a five-year period, the average public corporation faces a 9% probability of facing at laws, see generally John C. Coffee, Jr., Rescuing the Private Attorney General: Why the Model of the Lawyer as Bounty Hunter Is Not Working, 42 MD. L. REV. 215 (1983). Miller, The Plaintiff's Attorneys' Role in Class Action and Derivative Litigation: Economic Analysis and Recommendations for Reform, 58 U. CHI. L. REV. 1 (1991) (proposing private rights of action be auctioned to attorneys seeking to bring the class claim).

[4]Although there is little documentation of the discussion of Kalven's and Rosenfield's theory during the advisory committee sessions, their arguments proved important to the final proposed rule. See Note, Developments in the Law — Class Actions, 89 HARV. L. REV. 1318, 1321-23 (1976).

least one securities class action lawsuit.[5] As Congresswoman Anna Eshoo (D-Cal.) has put it, "Businesses in my region place themselves in one of two categories: those who have been sued for securities fraud and those that will be."[6] In the last four years alone, securities class action settlements have exceeded two billion dollars per year.[7]

What are the sources of the problems confronting securities class litigation? And how might we address them in a way that ensures we protect the valuable function securities class action litigation was originally intended to serve? This article seeks to offer a preliminary step toward answering these questions.

I. CERTAIN STRUCTURAL PROBLEMS OF SECURITIES FRAUD CLASS ACTIONS

A. The Incentive to Bring – and the Pressure to Settle – Meritless Suits

Because the amount of damages demanded in securities class actions is frequently so great, corporations often face the choice of "stak[ing] their companies on the outcome of a single jury trial, or be forced by fear of the risk of bankruptcy [into settling] even if they have no legal liability."[8] Unsurprisingly, executives faced with the potential destruction of their companies in a single trial typically opt to settle – even if it means paying out on meritless claims. They are, as Congress has recognized, "confronted with [an] implacable arithmetic . . . even a meritless case with only a 5% chance of success at trial must be settled if the complaint claims hundreds of millions of dollars in damages."[9] Illustrating just how powerful the incentive to settle can be, Bristol-Myers Squibb recently agreed to settle a pending class action for $300 million even after the suit was dismissed with prejudice at the trial court level.[10]

With such pressure to settle meritless suits comes, unsurprisingly, a concomitant incentive to bring them. As one academic commentator has candidly recognized, there is simply "no appreciable risk of non-recovery" in securities class actions; merely "[g]etting the claim into the legal system, Indeed, [Melvyn I.] Weiss and his partner William S. Lerach of the Milberg firm have stated that losses in these cases are 'few and far between,' and they achieve a 'significant settlement although not always a big legal fee, in 90% of the cases [they] file.'"[12] Even the Supreme Court has acknowledged that, as a result of this phenomenon, securities class action litigation poses "a danger of vexatiousness different in degree and in kind from that which accompanies litigation in general."[13] Illustrating how tempting these cases are for plaintiffs' lawyers, one court found it "peculiar that four of the lawsuits consolidated in this action were filed around 10:00 a.m. on the first business day following [the defendant's] announcement" of business problems and that "[m]ost of the complaints are virtually identical (including typographical errors)."[14] At the hearing on the defendant's motion to dismiss, the judge inquired:

> [H]ow did you get to be so smart and to acquire all this knowledge about fraud from Friday to Tuesday? On Friday afternoon, did your client suddenly appear at your doorstep and say 'My God, I just read in the Wall Street Journal about Travelers. They defrauded me,' and you agreed with them and you interviewed them and you determined that there was fraud and therefore you had a good lawsuit, so you filed it Tuesday morning, is that what happened?[15]

The court tellingly noted that "[c]ounsel for the plaintiffs was not responsive to this line of inquiry."[16]

B. The Incentive to Reward Class Counsel But Not Necessarily Class Members

While plaintiffs' attorneys have a strong financial incentive to bring meritless suits, and defendants have a strong incentive to settle them, neither has a particularly strong incentive to protect class members. Once the scope of the settlement fund is determined, defendants usually have no particular concern how that fund is allocated between class members and plaintiffs' counsel. And with the threat of adversarial scrutiny from the defendant largely abated, plaintiffs' counsel has free reign to seek (and little reason not to try to grab) as large a slice of the settlement fund as possible. Thus, settlement hearings frequently devolve into what the Third Circuit has called "jointly orchestrated . . . pep rallies," in which no party questions the fairness of the settlement or attorneys' fee request and "judges no longer have the full benefit of the adversarial process."[17] This arrangement has led one prominent securities fraud attorney to boast that "I have the greatest practice in the world because I have no clients. I bring the case. I hire the plaintiff. I do not have some client telling me what to do. I decide what to do."[18]

Just how true that is can be illustrated by a 2002 settlement involving AT&T and Lucent regarding allegedly improper billing practices. A settlement fund for class members and counsel was established and valued at $300 million in settlement hearing proceedings. Soon after, the lawyers for the class collected some $80 million in fees, or more than 26% of the $300 million fund. Class members, meanwhile, "didn't collect as easily."[19] Two years later, in 2004, the parties revealed that class members found the settlement terms so unattractive that they had bothered to redeem a mere $8 million from the settlement fund – meaning that the plaintiffs' lawyers earned ten times the amount of the injured consumers.[20]

In re PeopleSoft Securities Litigation exemplifies the same problem.[21]

Immediately following a decline in the common stock of PeopleSoft, Inc., 19 complaints were filed alleging that top company executives had made materially false and misleading statements to inflate the stock price. At the onset of the action, counsel represented that the case was worth hundreds of millions of dollars in damages. Yet, one year later, the plaintiffs sought approval for a settlement of $15 million. In reviewing the proposed settlement, the district court concluded that counsel had engaged in "minimal" discovery, "on the borderline of acceptability" given the purported scope of the case. Although the district court concluded that "a substantial part of the allegations that led the court to sustain the complaint in the first place are untrue, were never true, and had, at most, razor-thin support," plaintiffs' counsel pocketed $2.5 million in fees and expenses all taken from the common settlement fund.[22]

C. The Transfer Effect

Yet another unique structural issue affects securities class action settlements. Because settlement payments often come largely out of corporate coffers (directors' and officers' insurance policies also contribute), securities class actions frequently involve only "a transfer of wealth from current shareholders to former shareholders."[23] That is, to the extent the corporation pays out, it is only transferring a portion of that wealth to existing shareholders' bank accounts (essentially an economic wash) in addition to sums paid to former shareholders who sold at some point during the class period and, of course, class counsel. Thus, to the extent that class members still own shares in the company at the time of the suit (as they often do), "payments by the corporation to settle a class action amount to transferring money from one pocket to the other, with about half of it dropping on the floor for lawyers to pick up."[24] All this led Judge Friendly to observe that securities fraud litigation carries the risk of "large judgments, payable in the last analysis by innocent investors, for the benefit of speculators and their lawyers."[25]

II. WHERE TO GO FROM HERE?

A. Recent Efforts at Reform

To be sure, Congress has recognized and sought to address some of the negative side-effects of securities class action litigation.[26] In 1995, Congress enacted the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act[27] ("PSLRA").[28] It followed up in 1998 with the Securities Litigation Uniform Standards Act ("SLUSA").[29] Together, these bills sought to toughen pleading standards for securities class action suits,[30] encourage the appointment of pension funds as lead plaintiffs in the hope that they might better oversee class counsel,[31] and ensure that cases are tried in federal courts rather than in state courts.[32]

Congress's reforms, however, did little to address the underlying incentives that encourage plaintiffs' lawyers to bring – and defendants' lawyers to settle – meritless suits, or the incentives the parties have to benefit class counsel more than class members.[33] In fact, there has been a 32% nationwide increase in the mean number of securities fraud suits filed in the six years since the enactment of the PSLRA.[34] According to one published report, public companies now face a nearly 60% greater chance of being sued by shareholders.[35] And virtually all of these suits continue to be settled. One recent opinion quoted a statistic showing the dismissal rate in the Ninth Circuit as only 6%.[36] Studies show, too, that six years after the passage of the PSLRA, shareholders in class action suits collected, on average, just six cents for every dollar of claimed loss while their counsel continue to reap enormous fees.[37] As a result, despite congressional efforts at reform securities class action settlements reached an all-time high in 2004 of $2.9 billion.[38]

More recently, Congress passed the Class Action Fairness Act of 2005.[39] That law imposes several new hurdles for class action litigants. First, the Act expands the original jurisdiction of the federal courts to include suits where the aggregate amount of controversy exceeds $5 million and the class includes at least 100 potential members, only one of whom must be a citizen of a different state than the defendant.[40] Second, the Act eliminates restrictions on removal, including the one-year time limitation otherwise applicable to civil suits, the need for all defendants to consent to removal, and the inability for defendants to remove from state courts where they are citizens.[41] Third, the Act closes the so-called "joinder loophole" that allowed massive actions on behalf of numerous plaintiffs to proceed without seeking class action certification by extending federal jurisdiction over most all civil actions seeking monetary damages on behalf of 100 or more persons.[42] The Class Action Fairness Act also places new controls on the settlement of class actions, particularly certain settlements awarding coupons in lieu of damages.[43]

For better or for worse, however, the Class Action Fairness Act will have little impact on securities class action litigation. By its terms, the Act does not apply to claims that could not already be removed under SLUSA, suits relating to "internal affairs or governance of a corporation," and suits relating to breaches of fiduciary duties in the sale of a security.[44] As a result, securities fraud class actions remain susceptible to the very problems that Congress sought to redress in other forms of class action litigation.

Beyond Congress, some have promoted recent changes to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure as ways to improve the class action mechanism. Like Congress's reforms, however, these recent rule changes simply do not address the fundamental problematic incentives and structures unique to securities litigation.

First, until its recent amendment, the decision whether to opt out of a Rule 23 class action frequently had to be made early in the case – often before the nature and scope of liability and damages could be fully understood. As amended, Rule 23(e)(3) now permits courts to refuse to approve a settlement unless it affords a new opportunity to request exclusion at a time when class members can make an informed decision based on the proposed settlement terms. Early experience, however, shows that few courts have permitted additional opt-out periods following settlement approval.[45] Critically, too, a second opt-out offers no protection where settlement occurs before a class is certified – yet such early settlements are the norm in securities class action litigation given the scope of damages they involve, and the fact that securities class actions are so frequently certified.[46]

Second, Rule 23(f) has been amended to encourage interlocutory appeals from district court class certification orders. Early reports indicate, however, that Rule 23(f) has been used modestly, resulting in approximately nine published opinions per year since the rule was adopted in 1998.[47] The discretionary nature of Rule 23(f), moreover, has led to a patchwork of standards and guidelines in the circuit courts, thus raising the possibility of inconsistent remedies depending on the forum.[48] And, once again, Rule 23(f) provides little assistance in cases where settlement occurs before class certification – and that is, again, the dominant practice in securities class actions.[49]

B. Toward Meaningful Reform in Securities Class Action Settlements

While the procedural fixes and patches enacted by Congress and in the federal rules may help, it seems clear that they have proven insufficient to the task of preventing unmeritorious securities fraud cases or deterring settlements that benefit lawyers more than their clients. Future reform efforts may be more effective if focused less on procedures and more directly on the underlying economic incentives. What does this mean? Here are some possibilities.

1. Enforce the PSLRA's Loss Causation Requirement

A majority of circuit courts have held that a securities fraud plaintiff must demonstrate that the price of the security at issue declined as the result of disclosure of previously concealed information, and have limited the plaintiff's damages to the amount of that decline.[50] As recently explained by the Second Circuit in an opinion affirming the decision of the late Judge Milton Pollack in Lentell v. Merrill Lynch, "to establish loss causation, a plaintiff must allege . . . that the subject of the fraudulent statement or omission was the cause of the actual loss suffered."[51] There, a class of investors in once high-flying Internet startups brought suit for losses suffered after the now-famous "irrational exuberance" that fueled investments in the late 1990s diminished and the Internet stock price bubble burst. Eager to find someone to blame for their losses, the plaintiffs filed suit against Merrill Lynch claiming the company issued false recommendations in its analyst reports – this despite the fact that the plaintiffs were not clients of Merrill Lynch and had not relied on, read, or even seen a copy of any of Merrill's reports. The Second Circuit rejected the plaintiffs' construction of the loss causation requirement and held that they failed "to account for the price-volatility risk inherent in the stocks they chose to buy" or plead any other facts showing that "it was defendant's fraud – rather than other salient factors – that proximately caused [their] loss."[52] need only argue that the price of a security was "inflated" when he or she bought shares.[53] Rather than holding companies liable for the damage they inflict, as reflected by actual market events, the Ninth Circuit's rule thus permits liability to be found and damages to be awarded even when the plaintiff can point to no actual market price reaction to a corrective disclosure at all. Under this regime, a plaintiff can bring a class action simply on the allegation that a company's share price was once "inflated" because of the undisclosed accounting issue – and do so without ever having to establish a causal link between any price decline and the alleged misrepresentation. The Ninth Circuit's approach thus allows recovery where investors are never hurt by the alleged fraud, including in cases where the plaintiff sold before the alleged misrepresentation was exposed; where the misrepresentation was never exposed at all; or where the misrepresentation was exposed but the market did not respond negatively.

The facts of the Ninth Circuit case are illustrative. On February 24, 1998, Dura Pharmaceuticals announced a revenue shortfall for the following year, unrelated to any alleged fraud. By the next day, shares in Dura dropped from $39.125 to $20.75 for a one-day loss of 47%. Some nine months later, on November 3, 1998, Dura announced for the first time that the Food and Drug Administration had declined to approve its Albuterol Spiros product – an announcement that plaintiffs themselves contend constitutes the first public disclosure of the alleged fraud in this case. Following this announcement, however, Dura shares fell only slightly and briefly. Share prices initially dropped from $12.375 to $9.75, but, within 12 trading days, they recovered to $12.438, ultimately climbing to $14.00 within 90 days of the announcement. A claim of fraud on behalf of Dura investors followed.

But seeking to boost their recovery, the class plaintiffs never alleged damages based on the brief and shallow $2.625 stock price dip after the November 3 disclosure of the supposed fraud. Rather, they demanded recovery based on the much more significant February 24 stock price decline of $19. In other words, the plaintiffs sought damages based on a decline in share value that occurred nine months before the disclosure of the alleged fraud. The facts were as simple, and seemingly insufficient, as if Mrs. Palsgraf had filed suit for a headache she developed before ever leaving for the train station. The district court agreed and dismissed the action. The Ninth Circuit saw things differently, finding loss causation satisfied where the plaintiffs "have shown that the price on the date of purchase was inflated because of the misrepresentation."[54] staggering. Rather than holding companies liable for the damage they inflict, as reflected by actual market events, the Ninth Circuit's rule permits liability to be found and damages to be awarded even when the plaintiff can point to no actual market price reaction to a disclosure of the supposed fraud. Denying courts any means for weeding out at the pleading stage suits where the alleged fraud had no empirical effect on share price, and thus imposed no demonstrable harm on class members, the Ninth Circuit's rule adds fuel to a fire in which virtually every case is settled, wealth is transferred away from current shareholders to former shareholders.

Recently, however, the Ninth Circuit's treatment of the loss causation requirement received a cool response when the Supreme Court granted certiorari and heard arguments in the Dura case – a case that gives the High Court its first chance to explain the loss causation doctrine.[55] The questions posed by the Justices at oral argument suggest a fundamental disagreement with the Ninth Circuit's logic, exemplified by Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg's observation: "How could you possibly hook up your loss to the news that comes out later? There is no loss until somehow the bad news comes out."[56]

[55]The Solicitor General had urged the Supreme Court to review the decision concluding that the Ninth Circuit's reasoning was "difficult to reconcile with the well-established principle that transaction causation and loss causation are distinct elements of a Rule 10b-5 cause of action." See Brief for the United States as Amicus Curiae at 12, *Dura Pharms., Inc. v. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor also summed up the problem: "The reason why loss-causation is used is because a 'loss' experienced by the plaintiff is 'caused' by the misrepresentation. You have to put pleadings that are clear, which you didn't do."[57]

The Court's skepticism is well-founded. The Ninth Circuit's holding introduces a new legal rule that only further encourages plaintiffs to file and companies to settle meritless claims by removing a key safeguard against such suits. Worse still, the Ninth Circuit's rule encourages risky investment behavior, effectively forcing issuers to insure against speculative losses having nothing to do with their own conduct. Under the Ninth Circuit's rule, an investor can file a claim and obtain recovery even when the disclosure of an allegedly fraudulent statement has absolutely no effect on the stock price. To estimate damages in the absence of any contemporaneous real world stock price movement, moreover, the Ninth Circuit's rule encourages, and in fact depends upon, a return to the use of "junk science" by allowing recovery where disclosures do not prompt any stock price decline – i.e., any actual harm. Under this standard, the parties and courts are, by necessity, forced to rely on a grab-bag of speculative theories to estimate damages since no empirically verifiable proof of injury exists. Like Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals and its progeny, the loss causation requirement arms courts with a tool to ensure that the legal system compensates fully for empirically confirmable losses, but not for "phantom losses" based on "cause-and-effect relationships whose very existence is unproven and perhaps unprovable."[58]

By contrast, the alternative loss causation rule endorsed by the Government, petitioners, and four other courts of appeals would avoid all of these problems while ensuring full recovery of real losses. Requiring plaintiffs to plead facts showing loss causation enables judges to separate investor losses stemming from actual fraud from those caused by mere market downturns. Allowing the theory of "fraud-on-the-market" to satisfy the plaintiffs' entire burden on causation risks overcompensating investors for stock losses unrelated to any specific action by a defendant. Where an alternative cause (such as the marketwide drop in Internet, technology, and telecommunications securities in early 2000) results in comparable losses across similarly situated investors, plaintiffs must logically allege some facts that tend to show that their particular losses were caused by the defendants' alleged wrongdoings. Only by requiring a specific causal nexus can courts achieve optimal deterrence against fraud without transforming the federal securities laws into a system of national investor insurance.

2. Mandate Separate Fee Funds

The practice of paying plaintiffs' attorneys' fees from the settlement fund creates a powerful incentive to "structure a settlement such that the plaintiffs' attorneys' fees are disproportionate to any relief obtained for the corporation,"[59] and insulates the fee request from adversarial scrutiny. Paying fees out of the common settlement fund reduces the recovery available to consumers, and shifts the burden of paying the class counsels' fees to class members. In contrast, a regime that requires fee requests to be made separately from, and outside of, the class settlement fraud would help reintroduce the possibility that defendants might have some incentive to scrutinize fee requests and more closely monitor a regime that currently doles out 25% to 30% of every settlement to securities class action attorneys – many of whom do little or nothing to prosecute their cases and simply "free ride" on SEC or Justice Department investigations.

3. Revive the Lodestar Method for Calculating Fees

While the trend in federal courts has been toward using percentage of recovery methodology to determine fee awards, the lodestar method can provide a useful cross-check. The purpose behind any fee award from a common fund settlement is to compensate attorneys for the fair market value of their time in successfully prosecuting the class claims. While the lodestar method has been criticized as burdensome and fact intensive (it is both), strict adherence to the percent of recovery standard can also overlook inequitable fee awards. For instance, when Bank of America paid $490 million to settle a securities fraud class action in 2002, plaintiffs' lawyers pocketed $28.1 million dollars in fees. Although at first glance the fee award appears reasonable as a percentage of recovery, the plaintiffs' lawyers actually earned $2,007 per hour.[60] In such cases, the lodestar method can provide an important safeguard against attorney over-billing through a closer review of counsels' hours, rates, and other charges.

4. Employ Competitive Bidding to Select Class Counsel

A bidding process to determine class counsel would employ market forces to constrain the supra-competitive prices often charged by plaintiffs' attorneys. This concept was first employed by Judge Vaughn R. Walker of the Northern District of California.[61] There, the district court solicited sealed bids from law firms seeking to represent the lead plaintiff, accompanied by a description of the firm's experience and qualifications in such actions. The court then selected the lead plaintiffs' lawyer from these submissions, and determined the attorneys' fees based on the firm's own bid.[62] In another approach to competitive bidding, the district court might interview each of the prospective class attorneys, and select the lead plaintiffs' counsel based on the judge's independent analysis of the attorneys' ability to monitor and represent the interests of the class. Although Judge Walker's innovative approach was initially rejected by the Ninth Circuit,[63] recent amendments to Rule 23 appear to have vindicated Judge Walker's experiment, allowing judges to conduct competitive auctions based in part on the fees class counsel will receive.[64] reviewing and commenting on proposed settlements could also help expose and prevent collusive deals. In recent years, the FTC has launched an aggressive and admirable effort in this area.[65] For example, in In re First Databank the FTC successfully challenged the fees sought in a consumer class suit that largely relied on an earlier enforcement action brought by the Commission.[66] In Databank, the FTC obtained agreement on $16 million in consumer redress as part of an antitrust enforcement action. Soon after, a private class action settlement added $8 million to the consumer fund, for a total of $24 million. Despite this marginal increase, class counsel sought fees of 30% of the entire $24 million fund, or more than 90% of the additional value added by the private action. Based largely on the FTC's objection, the district court reduced the fee award to 30% of the $8 million dollar additional recovery noting that the settlement was reached after the FTC "had already expended substantial efforts to establish" liability.[67]

Other agencies – including the Justice Department, the SEC, and the state attorneys' general – should be encouraged to follow the instructive example of the FTC and begin their own oversight of class action settlements purporting to piggy-back on their own investigations. Indeed, the Class Action Fairness Act of 2005 imposes just such a reporting requirement for class action settlements not involving securities fraud. Under the Act, each settling defendant must notify both the Attorney General of the United States and the appropriate state officials no later than 10 days after any proposed class action settlement.[68] The Act further states that final approval of a settlement may not issue earlier than 90 days after notice to the governmental officials. It is unclear why securities class actions should be exempted from these requirements — especially given the federal government's strong and historic interest in the regulation of the securities industry.

The FTC previously sought to address the notice problem in 2002 in a way that would have helped in the securities context when it proposed an amendment to Rule 23 under which parties to any class action would be required to notify the court of any related actions by government agencies, and to notify the government agencies involved in those actions of the related private class action.[69] The advisory committee, however, somewhat astonishingly declined to adopt these suggestions. Until the committee or Congress recognizes the value of a hard, independent look at securities class action settlements and reverses course, no procedure exists to ensure the timely participation of interested governmental enforcement agencies.

6. Don't Duplicate Governmental Efforts

While agency oversight may help prevent collusive settlements, one well-intentioned feature of the Sarbanes-Oxley bill actually risks double recoveries. It is well known that actions by a federal regulatory agency frequently trigger parallel private class actions. Indeed, since the passage of the PSLRA in 1995, over 20% of all securities fraud actions have followed an SEC litigation release or administrative proceeding.[70] And more than half of recent SEC enforcement actions have produced parallel private civil actions.[71] The prevalence of these follow-on private actions is significant because Congress has recently granted the SEC the power to redress consumer harms directly. Section 308 of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act[72] allows the SEC to reimburse investors by depositing civil penalties for securities or accounting violations into a victim's compensation fund. And in the last couple years the SEC has exercised this authority with zeal, collecting hundreds of millions of dollars in compensation for affected shareholders.[73]

Where the SEC exercises this authority, therefore, a parallel shareholder class action may be simply unnecessary to deter the alleged wrongdoing and adequately compensate the investors.

To date, however, the SEC, Congress, and the courts have not given this question the attention it deserves and parallel class actions continue even in cases where the SEC has already acted to compensate victims. Permitting plaintiffs to receive damages through private civil suits in addition to disgorgement awards risks overcompensating both class investors and plaintiffs' attorneys who fail to account for the government's efforts in their fee requests. At a minimum, courts should insist that disgorgement awards be treated separately from any class action settlement to prevent plaintiffs' lawyers from "free riding" on the good will achieved by the government's enforcement actions.

7. Encourage Meaningful Oversight by Litigants

In the PSLRA, Congress sought to reign in non-meritorious suits by expressing a strong preference for having institutional investors appointed as class representatives.[74] Congress, not unreasonably, believed that (noting that as of 2004 the SEC had "brought 51 enforcement cases related to the mutual fund scandals and levied $900 million in disgorgement penalties").

[74]The PSLRA requires courts to appoint as "lead plaintiff" the class member "that the court determines to be most capable of adequately representing the interests of class members." 15 U.S.C. § 78u-4(a)(3)(B)(i), and creates a rebuttable presumption that the most adequate plaintiff is the party with the "largest financial interest in the relief sought by the class." Id. § 78u-4(a)(3)(B)(iii)(I)(bb).

"increasing the role of institutional investors in class actions will ultimately benefit shareholders and assist courts by improving the quality of representation in securities class actions," rather than leaving the responsibility to small individual holders, many of which were often repeat players closely aligned with specific plaintiff law firms.[75] Congress may have failed, however, to consider the magnitude of the task it asked institutional investors to assume. Although some are suitable candidates to lead class action litigation, many lack the staff, resources, funding, and experience to monitor independently the suits brought on their behalf.

For example, the trustees of the Louisiana Teachers' Retirement System recently brought a derivative suit against the majority shareholders of Regal Entertainment to stop the issuance of a $750 million dividend, despite holding only a $30,000 investment in the company. The court denied the Louisiana Teachers' application for a preliminary injunction, finding "'not a shred of evidence' that minority shareholder would be hurt," and the Teachers subsequently dropped their claims.[76] Notably, the court found the claims so doubtful, that it asked plaintiffs' counsel "[t]o what extent has the plaintiff thought about the claims they're asserting and have they really studied them?"[77] As it turned out, the Louisiana Teachers' Retirement System has been involved in 60 class action lawsuits in the last eight years.[78] Citing this substantial docket, one district court judge in the Eastern District of Tennessee declined to allow the Teachers to serve as a lead plaintiff in one of these class actions, concluding that "the Court cannot help but conclude the Louisiana Funds' resources are being spread too thin."[79]

To help institutional investors from becoming spread too thin, and the concomitant loss of meaningful oversight promised by the PSLRA, courts might consider greater enforcement of the PSLRA's "professional plaintiff" rule to bar actions repeating allegations already considered and rejected in a prior suit. The PSLRA prohibits a party from serving as lead plaintiff in more than five securities class actions brought during a three-year period.[80] Some courts have disregarded this rule with respect to institutional investors, relying on commentary contained in the Conference Report accompanying the PSLRA.[81] As other courts have properly noted, however, the PSLRA's plain language "contains no express blanket exception for institutional investors" and automatically excusing institutional investors from the rule would undermine rather than further the PSLRA's purposes.[82] Institutional investors themselves might also consider the creation of neutral litigation oversight committees to help them review solicitations made by plaintiffs' lawyers to ensure that the cases brought are meritorious, that fee agreements are fair and reasonable, and that any settlement benefits shareholders overall and does not, for example, simply result in a transfer of assets from current shareholders (very often including institutional investors themselves) to former shareholders.

CONCLUSION

Congress intended the PSLRA to reform the abuses that dominated securities fraud litigation in the early 1990s. Despite the best of legislative intentions, virtually all securities fraud claims that survive initial motions practice will be settled. With little prospect that their claims will be fully tested by the adversarial process, plaintiffs' attorneys have a strong economic incentive to bring ever-more securities fraud class actions without regard to the underlying merit of the suit, or the ultimate recovery to the class. Faced with such daunting prospects, businesses are frequently forced to comply with all but the most outrageous of settlement demands. As a result, new corporate investments are deterred, the efficiency of the capital markets is reduced, and the competitiveness of the American economy declines. And class members, who often have absolutely no interest in the suit from filing to final judgment, literally wind up paying the bills.

The reforms attempted so far are steps in the right direction. But none directly addresses the underlying economic incentives that drive the filing of frivolous securities fraud class actions in the first instance. Meaningful reforms must move beyond procedure to address these incentives directly. Enforcing the PSLRA's loss causation requirement will empower judges to dismiss securities fraud suits stemming from mere market downturns. Utilizing a competitive bidding process for the selection of class counsel will help address the de facto cartel responsible for the vast majority of securities class suits. Requiring attorneys' fees to be paid from a separate fee fund will increase adversarial challenges to exorbitant requests, and reviving the loadstar method will provide a tool to guard against overbilling. And no fees should be awarded for suits that do not provide meaningful benefits to investors after an opportunity for review by the appropriate regulatory agency. While no single reform can guarantee that securities fraud class action settlements will always be fair and reasonable, these proposals are just a few possible steps in the direction of helping to secure the full promise of the securities class action mechanism as the vehicle for consumer protection envisioned by Kalven and Rosenfield nearly six decades ago.

The familiar image of manipulative lawyers and rapacious clients bringing frivolous lawsuits is almost as much a part of American lore as George Washington chopping down the cherry tree. Whether it's teenagers suing McDonald's for making them fat or a woman winning millions for burning herself with spilled coffee, the succession of sensational stories fuels the public's fury at a legal system apparently running amok.

But now a growing number of political scientists are arguing that America's famous litigiousness is not rooted in plain and simple greed but is rather the logical response to America's distinctive distribution of power and to a historical distrust of big government.

The proliferation of lawsuits grows out of "fundamental features of the American constitutional tradition," Thomas F. Burke, assistant professor of political science at Wellesley College, declares in a new book, "Lawyers, Lawsuits and Legal Rights: The Battle over Litigation in American Society."

In other words, blame the Founding Fathers for their deep mistrust of centralized authority and their glorified view of self-reliance. The government they structured -- with its separation of powers, its limited national control over state and local police forces and its independent judiciary -- was intended to protect against tyranny, but it had the unintended consequence of making it harder for democratically elected leaders to get things done.

While countries like Britain, Germany, France or Sweden have a centralized government with powerful regulatory agencies to provide safeguards and with generous social welfare benefits to cushion life's blows, Burke argues, the decentralized American system forces Americans to take their problems to court. So instead of national health care, he says, Americans get proposals for a "patients' bill of rights" that would allow the sick to sue their managed-care companies.

Certain expectations

Burke was a student of Robert A. Kagan, a political science professor at the University of California and the author of "Adversarial Legalism: The American Way of Law." Kagan argues that while the public is suspicious of government, it nonetheless "expects and demands comprehensive governmental protections from serious harm, injustice and environmental dangers."

This "fundamental tension" forces people to turn to the courts to do everything from cleaning up the environment to rooting out discrimination to ensuring public safety. Under this system of "adversarial legalism," as Kagan calls it, the judiciary and lawyers become a critical part of the governing process.

Both Kagan and Burke rely in part on the work of the Stanford legal historian Lawrence Friedman, who in his 1985 book, "Total Justice," wrote that growing wealth and technological advances were increasingly leading people to expect government to solve their problems. As Kagan said recently, "People used to say if we can put a man on the moon, we certainly ought to be able to figure out how to make a product safe."

Modern tort law actually developed because the American government wasn't passing laws to protect people from the hazards of the Industrial Revolution, Carl T. Bogus, a law professor at Roger Williams University, explains in his book "Why Lawsuits Are Good for America," published last year. The courts stepped in to mandate safety measures, some of them life saving, when the legislatures refused to.

By the middle of the 20th Century, lawyers discovered that litigation could also be a tool for broad social change, filing the landmark Brown v. Board of Education in 1954. Then Congress passed the Civil Rights Act of 1964, inviting plaintiffs to sue to open up the workplace to women and minority workers.

'Due process revolution'

This was the era of what's known as the "due process revolution," when lawyers won criminal defendants the right to counsel and welfare recipients the right to hearings.

Eventually, the aged and disabled won rights that were likewise enforceable by lawsuits. Lawyers began bringing class actions, and the law seemed to be expanding into every facet of daily life. Sexual harassment law developed in the 1980s, for example, bringing the courts into the workplace.

All of this soon alarmed corporations and insurance companies, which began lobbying to limit their liability. By the 1990s, popular books such as "The Litigation Explosion" by Walter Olson and "The Death of Common Sense" by Philip K. Howard made the threat of litigation a public cause, warning that individual greed was replacing community values.

Not everybody accepted that story, however. Scholars such as Mark Galanter, law professor at the University of Wisconsin, published articles debunking the claims of outrageous litigiousness and demonstrating that there were not many more lawsuits in the 1980s than there were in the decade before.

Others such as Ralph Nader, the nation's most outspoken litigation supporter, defended lawsuits for their unusually democratic potential, asking: "Where else can a person without money take on General Motors?"

Like many liberal academics, Michael McCann, a political science professor at the University of Washington and the co-author of a forthcoming book, "Law's Lore: Tort Reform, Mass Media and the Social Production of Legal Knowledge," was once optimistic about using the courts to solve social problems. But now he concedes that lawsuits are often not the best way to get things done. The system is costly, inefficient and unpredictable, he and other scholars say, deterring meritorious claims and inspiring contentiousness.

Lawsuits are far too cumbersome to help the vast majority of people, Burke says. Of 100 Americans injured in an accident, he writes, only 10 make a liability claim and only 2 file a lawsuit. Only one in eight people who suffer serious injury from medical malpractice sue, he finds, and only about 50 in 1,000 who believe they've encountered discrimination at work file an action.

Burke also argues that partly because of well-organized defense lawyers, court decisions are skewed against plaintiffs. In his case-study of the Americans With Disabilities Act, for example, Burke finds that about 95 percent of plaintiffs lost on appeal. None of this means the laws have no effect, he maintains -- companies may settle those cases that have merit or be deterred from violating the law in the first place -- but the system is far from equitable or predictable.

Still, Burke doesn't believe that the solution is simply to limit lawsuits and monetary awards. "That doesn't sort out frivolous from non-frivolous cases," he said. He argues that replacements -- say, no-fault auto insurance -- could substitute for much of today's costly post-accident litigation.

Academics across the political spectrum point to state-run workers' compensation schemes as a rare example of a government-run alternative to litigation in America: a way to help injured workers without making them fight it out in court. Although such government-run systems have their drawbacks, even Olson, a senior fellow at the conservative Manhattan Institute, is surprisingly sanguine about them. In his forthcoming book, "The Rule of Lawyers: How the New Litigation Elite Threatens the Rule of Law," Olson warns that mass litigation has transformed lawyers and judges into an unelected "fourth branch of government." So to him, a workers' comp-style alternative to lawsuits would be an improvement. "It's so much more civilized," he said recently.

Scholars are now watching the heated debate over the Securities and Exchange Commission to see how the American political system will respond to a recent crisis that some say has come right out of the debate over litigation.

Congress steps in

In the mid-1990s, responding to complaints about lawsuits from accounting firms, Congress changed the law to make it harder for corporate shareholders to sue the accountants.

That, along with some other legal changes, essentially immunized accounting firms from liability for fraud, said John Coffee, a law professor at Columbia who has written widely about securities class actions.

"That can translate into greater acquiescence in aggressive and dubious accounting policies management wants to pursue," Coffee said.

Burke says the accounting fraud scandal is a consequence of the myths about American litigiousness. Congress took away the right to sue, he argues, but failed to substitute another credible means of enforcing the law. "So what are we going to do now?" Burke asked. "Will we build up the SEC?"

That is, of course, the focus of a bitterly contested political battle. But skeptical political scientists doubt that the fragmented federal government will be able to take a strong stand. Which means more calls to bring back the lawsuits are likely.

As Kagan said, "We end up with adversarial legalism because we have all of these government failures."

This "fundamental tension" forces people to turn to the courts to do everything from cleaning up the environment to rooting out discrimination, or to go one step further, to warn them away from unhealthy overeating or even unexpectedly scalding coffee. Under this system of "adversarial legalism," as Professor Kagan calls it, the judiciary and lawyers become a critical part of the governing process.

Both Professors Kagan and Burke rely in part on the work of the Stanford legal historian Lawrence Friedman, who in his 1985 book, "Total Justice," wrote that growing wealth and technological advances were leading people to expect government to solve their problems. As Professor Kagan said recently, "People used to say if we can put a man on the moon, we certainly ought to be able to figure out how to make a product safe." This quest for "total justice" has had the effect of creating a far greater role for courts and lawyers: because elected officials aren't sufficiently empowered to bring changes, people turn to the judiciary.

Modern tort law actually developed because the American government wasn't passing laws to protect people from the hazards of the industrial revolution, Carl T. Bogus, a law professor at Roger Williams University, explains in his book "Why Lawsuits Are Good for America," published last year. HEADLINE: CORPORATE CONDUCT: POLITICS;
Parties Trade Lobs Over Issue of Lax Oversight

BYLINE: By DANIEL ALTMAN

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, July 11

BODY:

While senators debated an accounting reform bill today in advance of an expected vote on Monday, Democrats and Republicans eagerly tried to blame each other for years of supposedly lax oversight of corporate behavior.

Richard A. Gephardt, the House minority leader, accused Republicans today of setting the stage for corporate wrongdoing through a gradual drive for deregulation, starting with the Contract With America in 1995. "We see daily evidence of what happens when the drive to deregulate succeeds," he said, "as it did over the last seven or eight years."

Mr. Gephardt distributed a 26-page pamphlet to support his point, with photographs of Tom DeLay, the House majority whip, and Newt Gingrich, the former speaker of the House, on the cover, along with the logos of Enron, WorldCom and other embattled companies.

The pamphlet describes Republican-led campaigns to deregulate the derivatives markets in which Enron traded, to cut financing for the Securities and Exchange Commission and to limit a handful of environmental and consumer protections.

In a response sent via e-mail, the Republican National Committee pointed out that some Democrats had supported the bills that Mr. Gephardt's pamphlet called "overzealous efforts to roll back public protections."

In every case, however, a majority of Democrats had voted against the bills.

Senior Republican aides in the Senate countered with their own pamphlet, which tries to pin lax oversight on Bill Clinton. It points out that the most recent company restatements involve earnings dating from his administration. The pamphlet also summarizes reports of connections between officials of the Clinton administration and Enron and Global Crossing.

In the House, a Republican staff member passed out reprints of newspaper articles detailing unusual financing arranged for Mr. Gephardt's presidential campaign in 1988 by Terry McAuliffe, who is now chairman of the Democratic National Committee. Another article described Mr. McAuliffe's business connections and his rise as a Democratic fund-raiser.

One of the House's two independent members, Representative Bernard Sanders of Vermont, said both parties were to blame for the "incredible culture of corporate greed" that led to the scandals. "Certainly the Democrats have not been strong enough on this issue," Mr. Sanders said, "and the Republicans are much worse."

Experts on regulation dismissed the back-and-forth sniping as misguided.

"I don't see how you can lay the blame for this at the doorstep of the Democrats or the Republicans," said Robert W. Hahn, director of the American Enterprise Institute-Brookings Joint Center for Regulatory Studies. For a long time, Mr. Hahn said, policy makers have known about the difficulties of ensuring truly independent corporate audits. Like the politicians, independent oversight agencies like the Financial Accounting Standards Board underestimated the problem.

"It's not as if politicians determine all the rules for these things anyway," Mr. Hahn said. "The notion that this is lax enforcement on the part of Clinton or his predecessor, Bush, or the Congressional committees is a laugh."

Robert A. Kagan, a professor of law and political science at the University of California at Berkeley, asserted that economic factors bore as much responsibility for the corporate scandals as political rule-making.

"The Clinton years were a time of huge economic development and change and new markets," Professor Kagan said. "That's going to develop the opportunities for new kinds of malfeasance."

He also suggested that Mr. Gephardt was exaggerating the deregulating success of Mr. Gingrich's time. "I don't think the Contract With America did very much with regulation," he said. "It was sort of a failure. The Republicans blew their opportunity."

HEADLINE: Loosen the Rigidity of Regulation, Authors Urge

BYLINE: By James L. Rowe Jr., Washington Post Staff Writer

DATELINE: NEW YORK

BODY:
Individuals and society need not face increased risks of physical or social harm as a result of President Reagan's moves to cut the budgets of regulatory agencies, according to a report prepared for the Twentieth Century Fund.

If administrators reallocate their reduced resources and concentrate on the worst pollutors, for example, society may get the same level of benefit at a lower cost, according to Eugene Bardach and Robert A. Kagan, professors at the University of California at Berkeley.

But if administrators make a "uniform" cutback in their activities, Kagan said, "they may be endangering the public more than they have to. It is a people problem. What happens will vary from agency to agency."

Kagan and Bardach said that what has passed for regulatory reform in the Reagan administration so far has been little more than budget cutting.

"In general, the direction is right," said Bardach. "In some areas--like toxic substances and hazardous wastes--the administration has been too insensitive" to the dangers of decreased regulation, while in other areas that require changes in the law, the administration has not moved far enough.

For example, when the Clean Air Act came up for review in 1981, the administration made no attempt to change or force Congress to reexamine some of the provisions that, according to Bardach, impose a high cost on society with relatively little benefit.

Kagan and Bardach are authors of a new report, "Going by the Book," on whether regulators are "reasonable" in their enforcement of protective regulations, such as air and water pollution control, workplace and highway safety, and job discrimination.

To make regulation "fair, uniform, predictable and accountable," Kagan said, the laws often "impose a rigidity that deprives the regulators of the ability to adapt the rules to the variety of circumstances with which they must deal."

The report was funded by the Twentieth Century Fund and published by Temple University Press.

Often, Kagan said, regulations get passed to deal with specific catastrophes that are the "bad apples--the worst coal mines, the nursing homes that are the most avaricious." Because regulators often are deprived of discretion by the rules, they are unable to focus on the most serious threats and businesses are forced to divert their efforts to what the regulators say is the worst problem, not what businesses may judge to be the worst problem.

He said chances of cooperation between regulators and businesses are reduced because of these kinds of rigidities. Often, he said, the problem is not merely an overzealous or rule-bound regulator, but the difficulty in "determining what is a truly dangerous situation."

Bardach and Kagan said that most regulations have been written to deal with legitimate safety, health or social concerns that are "imperfectly dealt with by the marketplace and liability law."

In many, but not all circumstances, they say, the aims of regulation might be better achieved by more "indirect" regulation through private action. Self-regulation, which is practiced by many professional and trade associations (as well as stock exchanges), might be used in some circumstances. In addition, most harms have some remedy in the law, they said. Furthermore, to enable potential victims to take actions on their own, more information about potential hazards should be made public. The government, as a prod, might require wider disclosure.

Bardach said he and Kagan were surprised to discover that about 95 percent of the "regulation" in the United States is not mandated by government, but is done in the private sector.

While more regulation might be moved to the private sector, some has to be undertaken by government, they said; water and air pollution, for example, where the specific harms to individuals and the specific wrongdoings by polluters are hard to prove and measure, probably should continue to be regulated by government.

One of the primary reasons that government regulation is so difficult, Bardach said, is that the government "picks up the messiest regulatory jobs that no one can do well."

Adversarial Legalism: The American Way of Law

Harvard University Press, 2001

Kent Roach [*]

This book offers a conventional yet important thesis: namely that the United States relies to an unprecedented degree on litigation as a means to advance and contest public policy. The author, Robert Kagan, is a professor of both political science and law with a special interest in the comparative regulation of American and European seaports. Professor Kagan's comparative and political sensibilities distinguish his work from the raft of other popular and academic work decrying excessive reliance on litigation in the United States.

The comparative strand in the book "draws on studies that contrast legal and regulatory processes in the United States with similar processes in other economically advanced democracies" (p.5). It results in an emphasis on "American legal exceptionalism" (p.6). The political strand is concerned with "the links between the distinctive characteristics of the American legal system and fundamental features of American political culture, political structure and political processes" (p.5). It results in an emphasis on how the strong courts found in the United States are a reaction and a substitute for the weak bureaucracies, legislatures and political parties found in that country.

Kagan's work will be of value to all those concerned with the role of law and litigation in governance. Those who are concerned that the enactment of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and increased use of class actions is Americanizing the Canadian legal system may be especially interested in Kagan's book. Kagan does not focus on Canada, but his analysis does suggest the need to place the Canadian legal system in its political context. For example, he concludes that Canadian environmental regulation is less legalistic, detailed and adversarial than American regulation in part because under the Canadian parliamentary system "the government in power can quickly amend the law to reverse administrative or judicial decisions that displease it" (p. 222). As he reminds readers throughout the book, the role of courts and the shape of the law are related to the larger political context of governance.

The first part of the book is devoted to articulating its thesis. Adversarial legalism is defined as "policymaking, policy implementation, and dispute resolution by means of lawyer-dominated litigation." (p.3) It involves complex legal rules, formal, adversarial and costly means for resolving disputes, punitive sanctions, more frequent judicial review of administrative and legislative processes, more political controversy over legal rules and institutions, fragmented decision making and legal uncertainty. Adversarial legalism is thus concerned not only with litigation in courts, but broader patterns of governance that affect administrative agencies and legislatures.

Kagan is candid that he is primarily concerned with the costly excesses of adversarial legalism and that his preference is for "more reliable administrative mechanisms for deterring official arbitrariness and economic rapaciousness and for compensating the victims of injury, injustice and bad luck." (p.17). To his credit, however, he is prepared to recognize some of the strengths of adversarial legalisM. In the second chapter, "The Two Faces of Adversarial Legalism," he contrasts the positive role of courts in reforming prison conditions in Alabama with their less positive role in delaying economic development such as the much needed dredging of Oakland's harbour. Even at its best, however, adversarial legalism is intimately related to weaknesses in the American system of governance. This is well symbolized by the fact that a court had to appoint the governor of Alabama to be the "receiver" of the state's prison system to ensure some political responsibility for the barbaric conditions of confinement.

The relation between adversarial legalism and weak governance is explored in the third chapter, on "Political Construction of Adversarial Legalism." Here Kagan the political scientist shines as he rejects cultural explanations for the American reliance on litigation in favour of institutional explanations. Congressional government and weak party discipline, as opposed to the strong legislatures, political parties and bureaucracies found in many countries with parliamentary government, have forced Americans to place greater reliance on litigation to implement the ambitious policies of the positive state. The result has often been regulation by litigation commenced by private attorneys general in the form of interest groups and entrepreneurial lawyers as opposed to more coherent and efficient policies as implemented by strong legislatures and bureaucracies.

The bulk of the book is devoted to exploring the causes and effects of adversarial legalism on criminal justice, civil justice and administrative law. There are striking parallels in his analysis of the pathologies of all three systems. All rely on high penalties (the death penalty, high damages and high fines) in an attempt to make up for the uncertain application of the law. The high costs of unleashing "the dogs of law" (p. vii) in litigation result in most cases being settled in a manner that may be as haphazard as random jury verdicts. The costs and excesses of adversarial legalism have perverse effects. Due process protections designed to ensure that welfare recipients are treated fairly encourage local administrators to be more stingy in granting welfare or to reduce welfare benefits. Aggressive prosecution of detailed regulatory offences encourages regulated industries to provide only the bare minimum demanded by the law.

Criminal, civil and administrative law is all characterized by a preference for decentralized local control (whether by elected judges or juries, state or municipal legislatures or prosecutors or private attorneys general) as opposed to the more centralized controls that come from national legislation, national bureaucracies or trial by career judges found in most European countries. The decentralized control that comes from court scrutiny of governmental and corporate behaviour provides a costly and unreliable form of behaviour modification. Increased litigation consumes much in private resources without any assurance of benefits in terms of either justice or deterrence. Kagan defends judge-dominated inquisitorial systems used in Europe as more efficient and predictable than the lottery of adversarial legalism before juries and elected judges. At the same time, he notes that the American adversarial system allows the State to off-load the vast majority of the cost of dispute resolution to private parties.

Kagan remains sensitive to the larger political picture by relating the Am reliance on litigation to its unwillingness to introduce no fault compensatior which would compensate more people with much lower transaction costs reluctance to guarantee health care or adequate levels of social assistan "political mistrust of government and politics itself leaves adversarial legalism" (p. 155) as the main means of compensating people and implem... norms of equality.

In his eagerness to illustrate the excesses of adversarial legalism, Kagan sometimes downplays its aspirations to justice. He appears somewhat critical of a famous death penalty case which went to the U.S. Supreme Court twice before the accused was electrocuted. The $2 million spent in public and private legal expenses in each death penalty case could be seen not so much as a sign of adversarial legalism but a symptom of America's decision to retain the death penalty when the European countries that Kagan admires have all renounced it. Kagan somewhat pejoratively terms David and Goliath struggles for justice in civil litigation "morality tales" (p. 144). He suggests that tobacco companies have hidden research on the addictive effects of cigarettes "because they feared that any admission would be used in pending and future lawsuits" (p. 146) when others may be less willing to see any excuse for such immoral behaviour. Kagan sees much corporate behaviour as essentially benign or a defensive reaction to adversarial legalisM. Not all will agree with Kagan's concerns about neighbourhood groups and advocacy groups using the courts to halt or delay nuclear power plants or waste disposals. There is a tendency to see adversarial legalism as a cause rather than a response to injustice, and Kagan does not seriously explore the counter-thesis that exceptional American legalism may be a response to exceptional American injustice.

Although the book takes a socio-legal approach, its methodology will not please all social scientists. Many of the wide and eclectic range of previously published studies that Kagan relies upon are more qualitative than quantitative. This, however, should not be seen as a flaw in a book that takes a broad analytic approach and is intended for a wide audience. Kagan's argument is only weakened when he reaches for quantitative conclusions that are not supported by the evidence. For example, he asserts that injustices caused by the loser pay cost rule used in civil litigation in almost all countries outside the United States in deterring risk-averse litigants "are not as large and pervasive as the injustices that stem from the American rule" (p. 123), which allows a plaintiff to bring an unsuccessful lawsuit without paying any of the victor's costs. It is difficult to know how the author has reached this conclusion given the difficulties of both costing and calculating the injustices caused by meritorious lawsuits that were deterred by the loser pay cost rule and frivolous lawsuits that were encouraged because of the no way cost rule. These, however, are only minor criticisms of a book that is well written and well researched.

The final chapter is devoted to proposals to tame adversarial legalisM. These include less reliance on civil and criminal juries, use of the loser pay cost rule in civil litigation, increased no fault schemes, better health care, a less politicized bureaucracy and more informal administrative tribunals. Kagan is not, however, terribly optimistic both because of his belief that adversarial legalism is deeply rooted in America's political and legal culture and that it is supported by elements of both major political parties. He confesses that what is most needed is "a bit of magic in a disbelieving age, to restore faith in the competence and public-spirited nature of governmental authority" (p. 250). If the quest to reduce adversarial legalism in the United States is indeed futile, the next question that Professor Kagan should address is whether adversarial legalism is spreading to other countries.

The Modern Transformation of Civil Law

George L. Priest*

This paper addresses the transformation of civil law that began in this country roughly around the mid-1960s changing a legal system that intervened in the lives of citizens only on occasions of serious moral dereliction into the most extensive and powerful regulatory mechanism of modern society. Prior to the 1960s, civil law served a modest role in U.S. affairs. It enforced property rights and policed boundary disputes through property law, enforced promises as well as disclaimers of liability through contract law, and provided damages for personal injury through negligence law (tort law) where an individual was injured by an egregious breach of standards of normal behavior. Though the negligence standard proved loose enough to allow substantial subsequent expansion, prior to the 1960s courts employed that standard only where a party had shown clear moral culpability substantially antagonistic to social norms. Standards determined by private contract were far more significant with respect to the determination of the obligations of citizens.

Since the 1960s, however, our civil law has changed dramatically. Contract law, property law, and especially personal injury law have been transformed both in function and effect. The transformation occurred neither through some sudden change in legal doctrine nor through legislative statute or popular referendum. Instead, it occurred through the triumph of a set of ideas: the acceptance by the judiciary of the proposition that civil damage judgments can serve as the most effective public policy instrument for regulating the level of harm suffered by citizens in the society.

* John M. Olin Professor of Law and Economics, Yale Law School. I have studied this subject for many years. See generally, Priest, The Invention of Enterprise Liability: A Critical History of the Intellectual Foundations of Modern Tort Law, 14 J. Legal Studies 461 (1985); Priest, Strict Products Liability: The Original Intent, 10 Cardozo L. Rev. 2301 (1989); Priest, The New Legal Structure of Risk Control, 119 Daedalus 207 (1990); Priest, The Culture of Modern Tort Law, 34 Valparaiso L. Rev. 573 (2000). This paper draws variously from this work.

It is surely not coincidental that the outset of the transformation of civil law was roughly contemporaneous with the creation of various federal regulatory agencies charged with controlling levels of harm, such as the Occupational Health and Safety Administration (created in 1971), the Environmental Protection Agency (1970), the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration (1970), and the Consumer Product Safety Commission (1972). In many respects, however, the transformation of civil law developed in ways that gave it a far more ambitious and extensive regulatory authority than any of these agencies. All regulatory agencies have limited budgets and, as a consequence, are constrained to thresholds of concern. Thus, even agencies with broad authority—such as OSHA or EPA—can effectively regulate the decisions of only a limited number of corporations. Other regulatory agencies—such as NHTSA—possess jurisdiction over only a single industry (auto manufacture).

Our modern civil justice system, in contrast, aspires to regulate the sources of harm with respect to all activities of the society. Our civil courts can entertain the question of whether a victim should receive compensation from the party that caused it harm as long as it is economically worthwhile for a person feeling victimized to initiate litigation. And all of such claims will be entertained. Indeed, to perfect the system, the incentives for initiating litigation have themselves been enhanced by various statutes awarding attorneys' fees and shifting litigation costs as well as by expansive notions of "harm", for example by awarding damages for medical monitoring to individuals who only suspect or fear that they have been harmed. As a result, our courts today employ civil damage judgments to regulate all activities implicating harm, made within every industry, indeed, by every citizen. Through the daily aggregation of civil damage judgments (or the settlement of lawsuits informed by expected judgments), our courts provide fine-tuned control of all societal behavior.

How did this transformation of civil law come about?[2] In the 19th and early 20th Centuries, the basic doctrines of civil law remained generally stable. Yet, there was serious debate in the legal academy as well as in the public policy community generally over the role of civil law with respect to harms suffered in the society. An important initial step in the transformation of civil law occurred in the early years of the 20th Century when civil law was abandoned as a mechanism for dealing with injuries suffered by workers during the course of their employment. The adoption by state legislatures of worker compensation statutes during the period roughly 1907-1915—creating mandatory employer insurance programs—represented the rejection of both tort law and contract law as means of regulating the sources of worker injuries.

Prior to the establishment of workers' compensation insurance, injured workers could seek recovery against their employers in tort law where they could show employer negligence as a cause of the injury. Employers could defend such claims, however, by showing that the worker had been contributorily negligent, that the worker had assumed the risk of injury, or that the worker's injury resulted from the negligence of a fellow worker, according to what is called the fellow-servant doctrine. Workers could sue their fellow workers for negligence, but recovery was not likely to be substantial given workers' limited resources. Thus, it became widely accepted that tort law was largely ineffective in providing recovery to injured workers, and tort law was rejected as a mechanism for recovery. In its place, workers' compensation statutes compelled employers to provide insurance for worker injuries and, at the same time, prohibited workers from suing employers in tort.

Though somewhat less sharply, workers' compensation insurance also represented a rejection of contract law as a mechanism for dealing with injuries. Few believed that workers, individually, were able to negotiate safer working conditions, and only a small portion of the working class was unionized. In addition, the concept of compensating wage differentials was not widely understood. Contract law, therefore, was not an answer. To the contrary, employer-provided insurance was necessary if workers were to receive compensation for injuries.

Besides serving the ambition of increasing payments to injured workers, workers' compensation insurance came to be justified by a concept that derived from economics: the concept of internalizing costs.[3] According to this concept, if a party engaging in some activity fails to take into account the full costs that the activity generates, the party is likely to engage in more of the activity than is appropriate for the society. Where the costs are injury costs, there will result higher levels of injurious activities and thus larger numbers of injuries than societally appropriate. If injury costs are internalized, however, the party causing the harm will be led to prevent losses where possible and otherwise to readjust its activity level to reduce the aggregate number of injuries. Compelling employers to provide insurance for all injuries suffered by workers during the course of employment serves to internalize the costs of worker injuries to employers.[4]

The adoption of workers' compensation programs was widely praised in the legal academy. Indeed, some academics thought the concept so meritorious that they sought to extend such insurance programs more broadly, to provide compensation for all injuries suffered in the society. Fleming James was a prominent promoter of this idea.[5] The ambition of James and others to have enacted general societal accident insurance, however, never found success. First, a general social insurance program is a program, basically, of socialism, to which there was deep

[4] By contrast, failing to compensate workers for their injuries, say, by enforcement of the common law tort defenses of contributory negligence, assumption of risk or the fellow-servant doctrine, serves to internalize worker injury costs to the workers themselves. Many years later, Ronald Coase would show that, with respect to activity levels, internalizing injury costs to workers will have economic effects equivalent to internalizing those costs to employers. This profound idea, however, remains foreign to the debate today. Ronald H. Coase, The Problem of Social Cost, 3 J. Law & Economics 1 (1960).

[5] James' work is described in more detail in Priest, Invention, supra.

political opposition. (Note that even during the New Deal, insurance programs were established only with respect to particular risks—such as crop insurance, savings and loan insurance, and Social Security.[6]) Secondly, general social insurance is at heart inconsistent with the internalizing costs rationale. General social insurance is not self-contained as is insurance for workplace injuries. To provide general insurance for injuries does not serve to internalize costs to the specific activities that generated the injuries. General social insurance would provide compensation to injured parties—sufficient grounds for support to James and others—but it would not serve to create incentives for reducing the accident rate.

Faced with the failure of their social insurance proposals and with no serious prospect of future success, many academics pressed for the expansion of civil law as a means of providing broader compensation to injured parties. James, again, was the most prominent toward this end. In a set of roughly fifty articles, James urged the expansion of tort liability in all of its forms and the restriction of available defenses, moving toward a standard of absolute liability.

For many years, James' advocacy had little effect. An opening wedge appeared, however, in the early 1960s with regard to the subject of manufacturer liability. Until the 1960s, recovery for injuries resulting from product use was chiefly determined by contract law. Contract law allowed the specific purchaser of the product to recover according to the terms of the express product warranty or of the implied warranty of merchantability. Recovery was available to the specific purchaser and, generally, only to the specific purchaser, because that person was the only party to the contract of sale (a legal doctrine known as privity of contract). Virtually all product warranties at the time, however, disclaimed liability for any personal injury associated with use of the product.[7] Thus, according to contract law and the terms of product contracts, there was no recovery for personal injury.

There had been some concern about the operation of these contract doctrines prior to the 1960s, but it remained chiefly academic. Some few jurisdictions recognized an action in negligence by a victim not a party to the contract. MacPherson v. Buick[8] was decided in 1916, but it extended negligence liability only to manufacturers of products regarded as "imminently dangerous", and only where it could be shown that the purchaser or an intermediate dealer would not inspect the product for defects. Over the four decades that followed MacPherson, some jurisdictions extended the scope of the negligence doctrine, in particular to cases involving spoiled foodstuffs, although the jurisdictions were far from unanimous. Thus, through the late 1950s and early 1960s, defective product cases were controlled by contract law with its privity requirement and, to a substantially lesser extent, by negligence law.

This was to change, however, and change dramatically in the early 1960s and 1970s first in the then-limited field of product liability. In my judgment, there were two conceptual forces leading to this change. The first was the delegitimation of contract law—in particular, warranty law—as a means for dealing with product injuries. The second was the growing belief that the expansion of tort liability in the context of personal injuries could have beneficial effects on the society.

The delegitimation of contract law followed from the work of another law professor, Friedrich Kessler.[9] Kessler was a German scholar who had fled the Hitler regime to the United States. Kessler had no specific interest in product-related injuries. His attack on contract law was far more expansive. Kessler believed that fundamental changes had occurred in the character of Western economies that deeply threatened democratic societies and the individual freedoms that had been achieved in modern times. Kessler attributed these social changes to the "decline of the free market system,"[10] which he saw as a consequence of "the innate trend of competitive capitalism toward monopoly."[11] Kessler's criticism of the capitalistic world was quite pointed. He described the modern industrial culture as a form of fascism. "The rise of fascism in our industrial world has made us realize that democratic freedom is not inevitable."[12] According to Kessler, single firms are now able "to control and regulate the distribution of goods from producer all the way down to the ultimate consumer."[13]

[7] The central warranty remedy then (as now) was repair and replacement if a product were found to be defective. There are good economic reasons for manufacturers to disclaim liability for personal injury—chiefly because manufacturer-provided insurance is a very poor insurance mechanism—though these reasons were never articulated at the time. See Priest, A Theory of the Consumer Product Warranty, 90 Yale L. J. 1297 (1981).

Quite curiously, Kessler saw the principal mechanism for this new means of fascist control to be contract law. The formation of "large industrial empires" had been made possible by contract and by standardized contracts in particular.[14] Standardized contracts—such as insurance policies or consumer product warranties—were the equivalent of the forms of bondage typical of the feudal era. According to Kessler, "[s]tandard contracts . . . [have] become effective instruments in the hands of powerful industrial and commercial overlords enabling them to impose a new feudal order of their own making upon a vast host of vassals."[15]

Kessler's most influential article with respect to the transformation of modern civil law is the classic "Contracts of Adhesion—Some Thoughts about Freedom of Contract". The article presents a moral narrative that contrasts the ancient to the modern, the good to the evil, the redeemable to the unredeemable that possesses a persuasive power that continues to command acceptance today. Kessler contrasts a "society of small enterprisers, individual merchants and independent craftsmen" for whom 19th Century contract law was designed, with large-scale enterprise and monopoly capitalism characteristic of modern times. Freedom of contract may have had meaning in the earlier world. Today, however, the prototypical modern contract is a standardized form employed by enterprises with strong bargaining power against weaker parties—consumers—in need of necessary goods and services. Modern contracts are contracts of adhesion that consumers must take or leave without ever understanding their terms at all. In this context, the enforcement of contract terms according to the principle of freedom of contract serves only to protect "the unequal distribution of property."[16]

The second principal conceptual force toward the transformation of civil law was the insistence by James and others that an expansion of tort liability would substantially improve social welfare. James, as mentioned, was principally concerned with providing compensation to injured parties. He supported general social insurance and, in its absence, the expansion of tort liability to achieve that end. His ambition was valuably aided, however, by judicial opinions that focused more sharply on the positive societal gains from expanded tort liability.

Judicial acceptance of the broader role of tort law toward these ends first appeared in 1944 in California Supreme Court Justice Roger Traynor's concurring opinion in Escola v. Coca Cola Bottling Co.[17] Traynor's opinion sets forth the grounds for the strict liability standard for product defects that later was adopted by the California Supreme Court and virtually all other states. The case was simple. A waitress at a restaurant was moving some bottles of soda pop when one of them exploded, injuring her. (The context of the incident was never made clear. The California Supreme Court, and Traynor, approached the issue as if the bottle exploded spontaneously. Whether the waitress dropped the bottle, hit the bottle against something, or stumbled and fell was not present before the Court.) The majority of the California Supreme Court also found the case simple: they invoked the tort doctrine of res ipsa loquitur (roughly, the event speaks for itself) to hold that, despite the terms of any contractual arrangement between the distributor and the restaurant (in fact, the Court did not even discuss the contractual arrangement), the manufacturer should be liable because Coke bottles should not explode.

Justice Traynor's concurrence was more subtle and more policy oriented. He concurred with the Court's finding of liability, but provided deeper grounds for the appropriateness of shifting the costs of the waitress's injury to Coca-Cola. Traynor embraced a theory of strict liability in tort of the manufacturer. Strict liability was to be distinguished from negligence liability—in which the victim has to show that the defendant committed some negligent act. Traynor analogized the strict liability standard to the standard of res ipsa loquitor: if there is something defective with respect to the product, the manufacturer is to blame. That analogy, however, important for many courts in the future, was not Traynor's principal point. Traynor argued that there were important social grounds to extend liability to manufacturers for product-related injuries. First, such liability would lead manufacturers to invest to prevent product-related injuries in the future. Second, tort liability, resulting in the payment of compensatory damages to injured consumers, would provide a form of insurance to the injured that could be passed along in the product prices paid by all consumers. The expansion of tort liability, thus, would—like workers' compensation insurance—serve to internalize injury costs to the firms that generated them. In 1944, however, Traynor's concurrence was only a concurrence, and received little notice, though that would later change.

These ideas—contract law is perverted by market power, and tort law is a means of encouraging investments in accident prevention and insurance for resulting losses—transformed modern civil law. The first applications, again, were in the products liability field. In 1960, in the case Henningsen v. Bloomfield Motors, Inc., the New Jersey Supreme Court marked the effective end of the relevance of contract law in defective product actions involving personal injury.[18] The decision repudiates the basic principles of contract law applicable to product defect cases. Henningsen involved an action brought by the wife of the purchaser of a car, injured when the car veered off the road without an adequate explanation, though there was testimony suggesting a mechanical defect. Even putting aside the privity of contract problem, the automobile manufacturer's warranty provided only for repair or replacement of any defective part and disclaimed implied warranties that might extend liability further, including to personal injury damages. The New Jersey Supreme Court held that the privity doctrine as well as the express disclaimer of implied warranties were invalid as a matter of law—quoting from and relying heavily on Kessler's "Contracts of Adhesion". According to the Court, contract law should not be read to "authorize the automobile manufacturer to use its grossly disproportionate bargaining power to relieve itself from liability . . . An instinctively felt sense of justice cries out against such a sharp bargain."[19] The Court held that Mrs. Henningsen could recover under the Court's interpretation of the implied warranty of merchantabilty.

The permanent shift from contract to an expanded tort law as the basis for the resolution of product defect claims occurred in 1963 in the California Supreme Court decision in Greenman v. Yuba Power Products.[20] The case involved personal injury from an allegedly defectively designed machine tool.[21] The manufacturer-defendant believed that its strongest defense was the failure of the victim to provide notice of the alleged breach of warranty within a reasonable time.

[21] The product was a wood lathe in which a piece of wood being turned had detached and injured the plaintiff. The Court gave no attention as to whether Mr. Greenman had fastened the piece of wood adequately prior to turning on the lathe.

The strict notice requirement of contract law, however, had been flagged as illustrative of the outdated character of warranty law in many treatments of the product defect question, including those by James and a scholar writing in a similar vein, William Prosser. In Greenman, it seemed to trigger the final acceptance by a majority of the California Supreme Court of Traynor's strict liability argument first presented nearly two decades earlier in Escola.

In Greenman, the court, in a Traynor opinion, announced the standard of strict liability in tort, applicable to a manufacturer whenever "an article he places on the market, knowing that it is to be used without inspection for defects, proves to have a defect that causes injury to a human being." The purpose of strict liability, according to the court, "is to insure that the costs of injuries resulting from defective products are borne by the manufacturers that put such products on the market rather than by the injured persons who are powerless to protect themselves."[22] For a further elaboration of justifications of strict liability, the reader was referred to James, Prosser and Traynor's concurring opinion in Escola.

Henningsen and Greenman were important moments in the transformation of civil law. One further event, however, vastly accelerated the transformation by jurisdictions skittish of the cutting edge. In 1964, the American Law Institute adopted Section 402A of its second Restatement of Torts, which extended strict liability to sellers of all products defective and unreasonably dangerous without regard to the seller's fault. The Reporter of the Restatement, William Prosser,[23] represented to the Institute that 16 separate jurisdictions had adopted strict liability or some standard resembling it, citing 40 different cases. This was blatant exaggeration. A rereading today shows that there were only three cases actually supporting Prosser's recommendation: Henningsen, Greenman, and a 1963 New York decision, Goldberg v.

Kollsman Instrument Co.[24] But Prosser's recommendation was sufficient for the Institute, and the Institute's adoption of the strict liability standard was sufficient for the various states to adopt the standard as well. Within a little more than a decade following the Institute's adoption of the strict liability standard, forty-one of fifty jurisdictions had adopted the rule.

As mentioned, the change in the legal standards regarding product liability was only an opening wedge in the more general transformation of modern civil law though, surely, a significant wedge. The broader transformation of the law resulted from the extension of the underlying ideas that had motivated the change in products liability, first, to all other areas of civil law and, second, conceptually by the acceptance of the proposition that civil law could serve as a mechanism for regulating all risks faced by the society.

First, although the strict liability standard itself has been limited to the products field, the concept of cost internalization that underlies it has been extended across the various fields of civil law. Thus, the internalization policy has been extended to justify awarding damages in pollution cases,[25] in sexual harassment cases,[26] and in false arrest, malicious prosecution and Section 1983 civil rights violation cases,[27] among others. In these various contexts, as with product manufacture, it appears evident to which party costs should be internalized: to the

Duke Homes, 755 F.2d 599, 605 (7th Cir. 1985) ("[G]oods produced by the entrepreneurs who do not assume the costs of remedying a tort (in this case sexism) are artificially cheap; forcing them to internalize the costs of the tort regardless of fault, eliminates incentives to be sexist and insures proper allocation of societal resources.")

Cost internalization provides us with a mechanism for reaching the correct level of deterrence for official misconduct. If people acting under color of state law know that they will bear the consequences of their actions, they will be deterred from violating a person's federal rights, but will not be over-deterred. The 'correct' level of deterrence will be established.") manufacturer rather than the consumer; similarly, to the polluter, to the party harassing the victim, and to the official committing misconduct.

The second extension of the concept involved its application to contexts in which it is less clear to which party costs should be internalized. In contexts such as these, extension of the cost internalization concept requires consideration of losses viewed as risks attending the activity in question. Thus, all losses suffered in the society represent the outcome of some probabilistic process. The actions of one party or another can be viewed as contributing to the probability of occurrence of a loss, arrayed upon a continuum from losses the probability of which is 100 percent—intentionally caused harms—to losses the probability of which is zero.

With this extension, the basic foundation of civil law is transformed into controlling risks through cost internalization. The question before the court becomes which party to the litigation is in the best position to control the risk of loss. Again, in many contexts—such as product manufacture—it may seem obvious which party is in the superior position to control risks.[28] In other contexts, however, determining which party is in the superior position to bear the risk of loss from the activity is more complicated and requires a seemingly more sophisticated analysis of the relative abilities of the parties before the court to prevent or to bear those risks.

The adoption of risk control as the central purpose of civil law shifts sharply the focus of legal controversy in each of its various subfields. In the field of contract law, for example, contract litigation only a few decades ago turned chiefly on differing interpretations in terms of standard English of the provisions of underlying written contracts. In modern contract litigation, in contrast, the issues have been completely reoriented around the question of risk. The fact that some change in underlying conditions led one of the parties to breach the contract is only the beginning of the inquiry. The issue before the court is which party should bear the risk of the change in conditions that impelled the breach. Today, courts summon sophisticated theories of economics and risk bearing to determine whether it is more consistent with the long-term interests of the parties to assign the risk of the specific change of conditions that animated the breach to the breaching party or to the victim of the breach itself.

Similarly, in earlier years the law of corporations and of mergers and acquisitions was defined almost exclusively by the terms of corporate documents. Today, the papers of incorporation are often treated as only other obstacles that must be surpassed as part of the analysis of how to allocate risks that affect corporate ownership and structure. In recent highly publicized litigation involving mergers and acquisitions, for example, the issue before the court is whether the market for corporate control will be facilitated by assigning the risk and the commensurate benefits of some novel method of hostile takeover to current shareholders, to current management, or to the corporate raiders who have initiated the struggle.

The development of risk control as the central function of civil law has been most prominent in fields involving personal injury. As in other fields, this development has led to an extensive redefinition of legal issues. In cases involving claims of medical malpractice, for example, modern litigation extends far beyond the earlier relatively simple inquiry into whether the doctor was morally culpable for breaching standards of community practice. In the most sophisticated malpractice litigation today, the issue is one of risk and its control: Did the attending surgeon have sufficient control over the determinants of the risk of the medical maloccurrence to justify liability, or should that risk be assigned to supporting physicians or to the hospital vicariously through a judgment against its staff?

An important implication of the adoption of risk control as the principal function of civil law is that issues of motive and volition central to the legal regime that prevailed until the 1960s are rendered largely irrelevant. In modern contract law, for example, the decision of a party to intentionally breach a contract has little legal significance. It is acknowledged that the risks are omnipresent that changes in conditions will occur that might unsettle contracts and, thus, that it is inevitable that some contracts will be breached. The role of a court, as a result, is no longer to punish breach of contract, but to allocate between the parties the risks of such changes in underlying conditions. Similarly, though in earlier years it was necessary to demonstrate that a manufacturer had acted with bad motives or had behaved recklessly or negligently, such issues today are largely ignored. The concern of the courts has extended beyond specific bad motives to the broader risks of product injury. Thus, a manufacturer may have organized its production process with deep humanitarian concern for the welfare of its consumers, but if the company has miscalculated the risks and benefits of safety design, liability will follow immediately.

Many believe the derogation in civil law of issues of motive and volition as indicating a decline in commitment to individual responsibility or, perhaps, a shift of expectations toward an impersonal or a collective responsibility. The shift in standards of law may indirectly have that effect as citizens revise their expectations of the ultimate consequences of misoccurrences that afflict them. But I believe that the stimulus for the shift toward risk control as the central purpose of civil law is different and that it did not derive from a diminished conviction of the importance of individual responsibility.

The legal regime that prevailed from the 19th Century through the mid-1960s functioned chiefly by categorizing certain actions that generated loss as so particularly extreme or egregious as to deserve liability for any harm that resulted. Actions subject to legal liability were those for which there was a dramatically greater chance than normal that loss would result. According to this regime, prototypical candidates for liability were harms caused intentionally and those close to the intentional because of the high likelihood of injury.

Resolving disputes according to the standards of risk control is entirely different and implies vastly different methods of legal analysis. A property law whose focus is boundary disputes, a contract law whose focus is breach of promise, and a personal injury law whose focus is serious moral dereliction are each regimes in which the law defines a clear demarcation between acts subject to liability and acts immune from it. If the property line is transgressed, a trespass action will follow. If the contract is not performed, or if the injurer is morally culpable, damages will follow.

According to this earlier conception of the role of civil law, there are certain clear actions for which liability will apply, but equally clear sets for which liability is unavailable. Indeed, there are large sets of injuries suffered by property owners, parties to contracts, and injured victims that not only do not justify liability, but do not justify even judicial scrutiny. For example, under such a regime, a consumer injured by a product who cannot show that the product was intentionally or recklessly mis-manufactured or who cannot show clear moral negligence in the manufacturing process cannot recover damages. From the standpoint of the law, the product-related injury remains one of life's hazards to be suffered as best as possible according to the victim's resources, but without reference to the legal system. As another example, if a farmer promised to provide a broker 1,000 bushels of corn but because of drought can only provide 500, the farmer has breached the contract and must pay damages to the broker for the remainder. According to the law, the farmer must suffer the loss because it was the farmer, not the broker, who promised to deliver the corn.

This is not to suggest that the earlier regime was totally indifferent to conditions generating losses. If the probability of injury from product use were exceptionally high, the law could conclude that the manufacturer should have known of the product danger and find the manufacturer liable despite its claim of ignorance. Similarly, if the drought itself were so extreme that it prevented the farmer from delivering any of the 1,000 bushels, the law could relieve the farmer by rescinding the contract by finding it impossible to perform. Nevertheless, the method of analysis under the regime, even in these examples, was one of comparing the extremity of the factual context of the loss to some standard of normal or expected behavior.

According to this approach, some actions differ so dramatically from the normal—reckless manufacture or breach of contract—that legal liability is justified. Legal analysis under such a regime consisted of categorizing acts as either qualifying as sufficiently abnormal to justify liability or not. Obviously, intentional harm-causing actions justified liability. Beyond the intentional, unusually egregious actions may have justified liability. In almost all other cases, however, liability was unavailable, and the law allowed the loss to lie where it had fallen.

The adoption of risk control as the central goal of civil law rejects this categorical method of legal analysis. A law concerned with risk perceives losses as occurring probabilistically, with greater or lesser likelihood. Actions become subject to potential legal liability if they increase the occurrence of loss by some sufficient amount.

This shift does not reject, but builds upon, the liability of the previous regime. Losses caused intentionally or that are especially egregious remain subject to liability a fortiori. The frontier of liability, instead, is extended to disputes involving actions that increase the probability of loss by some dimension, though they may not make the loss inevitable or even highly likely. Thus, a manufacturer is made responsible for avoiding more than recklessly or egregiously negligent production methods; the manufacturer must monitor all potential sources of product risk and will be held liable whenever a risk eventuates that the manufacturer could readily have controlled. Thus, manufacturers of automobiles are routinely held liable for failing to design safety features in autos that would protect even drunk drivers from injuries resulting from the accidents they cause.

Similarly, liability for breach of contract induced by a drought will turn not on the simple issue of whether it was the farmer or the broker who breached the promise. Rather, the breach of promise is viewed as a probabilistic outcome of the drought. The issue in the case shifts to the question of the appropriate assignment of the risk of drought: Is it better to allocate the risk of drought to the individual farmer, locked into the specific climatic position of the farm, or to the broker, who can diversify drought risk by entering contracts with geographically disparate farmers?

A law concerned with risk control rejects a discrete demarcation between actions regarded as extreme and those regarded as normal. All actions can be arrayed on a continuum of contribution toward loss. Thus, central concepts of causation are changed dramatically. The earlier regime that imposed a sharp distinction between particularly extreme sources of harm and all others was necessarily committed to a very strict conception of causation. Actions were subject to liability for causing harm chiefly if they constituted the sole or exclusive source of the harm. In contrast, our modern civil law, devoted to risk control, focuses less upon strict causation than upon contribution to the occurrence of the harm. Some action may generate liability because of its contribution to the risk of occurrence, though it was only one of many simultaneously contributing sources of the loss.

The new regime of risk control thus vastly expands the opportunity for the attachment of legal liability as well as the importance of civil law as an instrument of social control. Many decry what they perceive as the increased litigiousness of modern society. But the level of litigiousness is only a function of the underlying legal rules in force. Our modern civil law encourages litigation as an instrument for internalizing costs to control risks. Because in our society intentionally or egregiously caused harms are infrequent, the earlier legal regime that focused only upon such harms was a regime of very limited scope. In contrast, our modern legal regime, focused upon every contribution to risk, is a regime of dramatically greater dimension. Such a regime aspires to impose legal controls on all activities in the society that contribute to risk in any way. Thus, virtually every action by every citizen becomes subject to potential legal review because every action will increase the risk of some loss in some way.

To my mind, far from incorporating a diminished view of individual responsibility, the shift of the law's purpose toward risk control represents a vastly expanded commitment to standards of individual liability, though expanded liability is somewhat different than enhanced individual responsibility. Under the new regime, an individual may be held liable not only for intentionally or maliciously harmful behavior, but for all behavior that increases the risk of loss, though the loss itself may be remote. Under earlier law, an individual needed to make certain only that his or her actions caused no direct injury to another individual. Under modern law, in contrast, an individual must make certain that his or her actions do not increase the risk of loss in any way. Thus, for each citizen, the potential of civil liability is vastly increased. The law charges each citizen to carefully monitor every action for its potential contribution to risk of loss.

From the standpoint of the control of risk, it is difficult to define a truly solitary act—an act that does not in some way implicate risks to others. The gardener spraying plants or the recluse reading silently before the fireplace may not be subject to liability personally for the increase in the collective social risk from pesticides or particulates, but will suffer the attachment of liability as pesticide or firewood prices rise or as the society proscribes such enjoyments directly. It is equally difficult in a society concerned with risk to truly shield or isolate oneself from others. The gardener's yield will be affected by the acidity of the rain, just as book prices will reflect the shift to acid-free paper. The centrality of risk effectively prevents all efforts of social escape.

Beyond increasing the scope of individual responsibility, the regime of risk control dramatically changes the substantive content of that responsibility. The focus of modern law on risk control diminishes the importance of moral standards in the evaluation of harm-causing activities. It is no longer useful in such a regime to distinguish between the guilty and the innocent or the culpable and the blameless. Almost every human action will increase the probability of some loss by some amount; empirically, it would be extremely rare for an action to contribute zero toward the probability of occurrence of all losses in all contexts. It follows, therefore, that under the modern conception of risk, no action is ever truly innocent. Each of us must recognize that all of our actions are likely to harm others in the society in some way. As a consequence, every citizen stands in a position of continuous potential interaction with the law since every action is potentially subject to liability. Indeed, each of us must be aware that many of our specific actions may well lie close to the point on the risk continuum at which the attachment of legal liability becomes socially worthwhile.

Once it is accepted that all actions can be arrayed at some point upon the risk-contribution continuum, sharp moral distinctions lose moment. It is no longer possible to clearly separate the moral quality of one's personal actions from the quality of the actions of others. On the risk-contribution continuum, there are no clear qualitative differences between actions whatsoever; all actions contribute something to risk. The only question is the extent of the contribution.

The decline in the importance of moral standards as grounds for comparing loss-contributing actions, however, should not be interpreted to suggest that our new legal regime of risk control lacks moral foundation. The moral foundation of the new regime is relentlessly utilitarian. The objective of controlling risk as effectively as possible prevails over all else. Civil law serves to internalize costs, first, to create incentives to reduce the risk level as much as is practicable placing liability on that party in the relatively better position to prevent it. Second, if the injury could not have been practicably prevented, liability will be placed on that party in the relatively better position to spread the risks of the injury as if an insurer.

The adoption of these two utilitarian principles of risk control has subtly changed the nature of modern adjudication. Modern trials have been transformed from disputes between individuals to occasions for judicial social engineering. In earlier days, the function of adjudication was to resolve specific controversies between often embittered parties. In such cases, the particular moral qualities of the parties or of their actions were of central importance, as issues of motive and goodwill were crucial. In modern litigation, in contrast, the court must evaluate, not how one individual or another behaved in a moment of crisis, but whether one party or another, as representatives of generic categories of actors, was in a better position to prevent injuries or to spread the costs of them. In litigation of this nature, the qualities of the actual litigants become irrelevant because the issue before the court is how best to fashion incentives for parties in such positions in the future. An obstetrician and a nurse-midwife may have dedicated their lives to serving others; in the incident before the court, they may have exerted great effort to help the injured child and suffered as deeply as the parents over the subsequent injury. But if the court determines that the risk of injury was within their control, that it was affected in any way by some technical decision made or ignored, or that the two professionals or their insurers were in the best position to spread such injury costs, liability for a lifetime of losses may be placed upon them.

In modern adjudication, the dispute between the specific litigants is of secondary, even trivial, importance to the exercise. The concern of the courts is how best to fashion broader incentives to maximize social welfare. The parties themselves and the loss one of them has suffered become mere informational inputs to the process of judicial revision of controlling rules of law. The legal claim serves only as an empirical example of a social problem for which a more specific legal rule defining behavior is needed. Frequently in modern litigation, the parties are unwitting instruments of this broader judicial purpose. But increasingly in recent years, the adversarial character of litigation has become pretended rather than real. The requirements of procedure compel the parties to defend contesting positions. Yet often the litigants and their attorneys play out their roles, not as hostile adversaries, but as characters, knowing that the drama being staged serves only to determine which of their insurers should foot the bill.

The new purpose of the law has led courts to adopt many novel and interesting rules that seem bizarre from the vantage point of earlier years. An example is the 1982 decision of the New Jersey Supreme Court in Beshada v. Johns-Manville, a relatively early case in the transformation of civil law.[29] The case involved a claim by a worker that an asbestos manufacturer should be liable for damages because the manufacturer had failed to warn the worker that asbestos could cause cancer. The manufacturer sought to defend the claim by proving that, at the time the worker contracted cancer, it was not known and could not have been known scientifically that asbestos causes cancer. More perceptive of the contours of our modern regime, the plaintiffs challenged the defense as irrelevant as a matter of law. The court concurred, holding that the manufacturer was liable for breaching its duty to warn the worker that asbestos causes cancer though the court accepted that, at the time of the breach, it was impossible scientifically to have known that asbestos causes cancer

The notion of liability for breach of a duty with which it was impossible to comply seems to strain the most basic notions of responsibility. But responsibility in a regime of risk control has a very unusual meaning. According to the court, the manufacturer should be liable for the loss for two reasons. First, the decision improved incentives for accident avoidance: "By imposing on manufacturers the costs of failure to discover hazards, we create an incentive for them to invest more actively in safety research." Second, regardless of the information available at the time of injury, holding the manufacturer liable will serve to distribute the risks of product injuries broadly, because manufacturers can include expected injury costs in the prices of their products. Responsibility under the regime of risk control, thus, can mean a responsibility imposed ex post facto to reduce or to spread the risks of injuries.[30]

Many disapprove of the contours of modern civil law. But can those contours be changed? In my judgment, it is fanciful to imagine a return to the categorical analysis of civil law that prevailed until the 1960s. In retrospect, that legal regime was simplistic. There is a probabilistic character to all societal losses. All societal activities do implicate risks that some individuals will be harmed in some way.

The concept of internalizing costs to address those losses, however, can be substantially sharpened. As suggested earlier, Ronald Coase explained now forty years ago that, with respect to activity levels, injury costs are always internalized. Civil law is not needed to achieve the economic effect.[31] The question that remains is whether and how aggregate social welfare can be enhanced by shifting injury costs, which is to say, by changing the method of cost internalization.

Many have shown that employing civil law to provide insurance is counterproductive. Civil law may continue to possess a role, however, in creating incentives to directly reduce accident rates. Perhaps oddly, despite over forty years of experience with the expanded liability created by modern civil law, there are no empirical studies that have demonstrated that the expansion of liability has reduced the level of harm. Of course, there are strong market forces that generate greater levels of safety. No one has been able to show that legal liability serves to increase safety further.

Still, it remains possible that expanded liability enhances safety and thus that civil law can serve a regulatory role. It is an entirely separate question whether that regulation is sensibly administered through our adversarial process with the final decision delegated to lay juries, selected intentionally because their members know nothing about the subject before them. Put differently, we cannot imagine a regulatory agency such as, say, NHTSA setting standards for auto safety based upon the presentation of a claim by a single seriously injured individual with respect to that person's single accident, delegating the ultimate decision to laypersons.

[31] Although Coase's article is widely known and universally accepted, this point remains not fully understood even among economists. For a prominent example, see Steven Shavell, Strict Liability Versus Negligence, 9 J. Legal Studies 1 (1980), discussed in Priest, Internalizing Costs (forthcoming).

Our modern regime of civil law, nevertheless, remains deeply entrenched both in terms of economic interests (note the to-date successful efforts of the trial bar and the unions to thwart the rejection of civil law with respect to asbestos-related injuries) and in popular conception. To change that legal regime in a serious way will require a substantial demonstration of the harms that it causes.

TAX DIVISION OVERVIEW - FY 2007

A. New FY 2006 Program Changes: "Operation Follow-Through" Initiative

1. Executive Summary

The Tax Division requests 106 FTE (76 attorney FTE and 30 support staff FTE) and $6,786,000 in enhancement to its base appropriation to support the priority placed by the President on increased and more effective tax law enforcement. The Administration's renewed focus on tax enforcement has generated increased enforcement efforts by the IRS, which in turn has resulted in a significantly increased workload for the Division. Just as importantly, and to help meet the demand generated by the IRS's activity, the Division seeks this additional appropriation to support its "Operation Follow-Through" initiative.

As the graph illustrates and as discussed below, the Division is already beginning to experience an anticipated flood of complex civil litigation, while the number of attorneys available to handle that caseload is predicted to continue to fall.

Through Operation Follow-Through, the Tax Division seeks to handle the large influx of litigation resulting from the IRS's significant expansion of enforcement activity and its efforts focusing on tax kingpins—those who promote or enable the illegal tax avoidance of others, including scam artists and unscrupulous accountants, lawyers and tax preparers.

By doing so, the Division also seeks to advance the Administration's goal of closing the "Tax Gap." The Tax Gap is the difference between taxes that are owed and taxes that are actually paid. The IRS estimates (based on most recent data available, from 2001), that the annual Tax Gap, before enforcement activity, is between $312 and $353 billion. Enforcement activity reduces the gap to around $260 to $310 billion annually, but there remain huge amounts of taxes properly owing that are not being paid.

Part of the reason the Tax Gap exists is a decline in voluntary compliance with the tax laws. The IRS collects over $2 trillion annually; only $40 billion of this comes from enforcement activity. The balance, over $1.96 trillion (or 98 percent of total collections) results from taxpayers' voluntary compliance with the tax law. But the number of taxpayers who stated an unwillingness to comply voluntarily climbed from 11 percent in 1999 to 17 percent in 2003.[1] Efforts of the IRS and the Tax Division over the last four years are beginning to have an effect on voluntary compliance: the percentage of taxpayers who responded that it was OK to cheat on their taxes at least some of the time dropped in 2004 to 12 percent.[2]

This renewed willingness to adhere to the tax laws results in part from the Bush Administration's renewed focus on tax enforcement. In Fiscal Year 2005, the IRS received an additional $227.5 million for enforcement efforts. President Bush's 2006 budget request seeks an additional $500 million for IRS enforcement activities, a 7.8 percent increase above the 2005 funding. A significant portion ($233 million and 1307 FTE) of the FY 2006 increase sought by the IRS is devoted to closing the Tax Gap through targeted enforcement efforts:

IRS FY 2006 Budget Request[3]
	New Funding Requested	FTE
Corrosive Non-Compliance Driving the Tax Gap	$ 149,700,000	920
Corrosive Corporate Non-Compliance (Base Reinvestment)	$ 6,711,000	52
Corrosive Corporate Non-compliance (New Program Initiative)	$ 51,800,000	236
Abusive Transactions	$ 14,460,000	77
Fraudulent Refund Crimes	$ 10,772,000	22
Total	$ 233,443,000	1307

As described below, the Tax Division has been an integral part of the Administration's increased enforcement initiatives, resulting in ever-increasing workloads for the Division's attorneys. However, the additional resources being devoted in the IRS's 2005 and 2006 budget will have a direct impact on the Tax Division's workload in 2007 and thereafter, as additional cases and investigations are identified and readied for civil and criminal litigation and then referred to the Division. To handle this expected influx and properly support the Administration's priority on enhanced tax enforcement, the funding of the Tax Division's FY 2007 budget request is imperative.

2. "Operation Follow-Through"

a) Background

The Tax Division proposes "Operation Follow-Through" to allow the Department to handle the increased litigation resulting from the IRS's additional enforcement efforts.

DOJ_NMG_0142576

Unlike many other sorts of program initiatives, however, the additional work covered by this proposal is not discretionary: the Tax Division must handle the cases referred by the IRS, or cases will go undefended or priority enforcement initiatives will be thwarted. The Division has prioritized and can prioritize its work, in tandem with the IRS, to focus on cases that return maximum enforcement effect for each dollar spent. Accordingly, the Division has focused, and will continue to focus, a large share of its resources on curtailing the activity of promoters, enablers and tax professionals (including return preparers, accountants and lawyers) who help others to avoid taxes illegally—the tax-avoidance kingpins.

Tax kingpins enable illegal tax avoidance by:

- Promoting tax fraud schemes
- Devising and promoting abusive technical tax shelters for corporations and wealthy individuals
- Publicly advocating defiance of the tax laws on frivolous or false grounds

Some tax kingpins make considerable sums charging clients for advice or tax-avoidance packages. Others are motivated by ideological resistance to taxes or to legitimate government authority in general.

Like drug kingpins, tax kingpins are the vector of illegal activity, enabling and encouraging their customers—hundreds and sometimes thousands of them—to break the law, usually for their own enrichment. Those who are tempted to avoid taxes through illegal means rely on them for assistance. And honest taxpayers can be led astray and engage in improper transactions or file fraudulent tax returns based upon the tax kingpins' advice.

Focusing our finite resources on tax kingpins gives each dollar of enforcement effort a multiplier, or a "ripple effect," extending the power of enforcement resources to hundreds of thousands of people. By taking tax kingpins out of the equation, tax evaders lose the help of willing accomplices.

Moreover, public enforcement efforts against tax kingpins reinforce an ethic of respect for law, showing the taxpaying public that the tax laws are being fairly enforced, reassuring honest taxpayers that they are not "chumps" for paying their taxes, and encouraging honest businesses that they do not face a competitive disadvantage when they meet their tax obligations.

b) Main Components of Operation Follow-Through

(1) Challenging and closing down abusive technical tax shelters for corporations and the wealthy

A prime feature of Operation Follow-Through is litigation seeking to shut down complex tax shelters. In these cases, the Division challenges, on the merits, the legitimacy of sophisticated financial transactions that the IRS believes are engaged in solely or primarily to avoid taxes rather than for any business purpose. The transactions at issue often are devised, packaged and sold by large accounting firms or law firms.

DOJ_NMG_0142577

Shelter cases typically require extensive discovery, briefing, depositions, expert witness preparation and trial time, consuming thousands of hours of attorney time. The Tax Division must devote an increasingly large portion of its resources to complex tax shelter litigation to handle the cases adequately and to succeed.

(2) Opening the books and customer lists of tax shelter promoters to IRS inspection, through enforcement of IRS summonses

Tax kingpins instruct their clients on how to evade detection on their tax returns. Consequently, the IRS is frequently unable to identify, based on returns alone, which taxpayers have used sophisticated transactions to manipulate their income and deductions to reduce tax. One of the main tools provided by statute to assist the IRS with investigation of suspected illegal tax avoidance is the administrative summons, which the IRS can issue to taxpayers or third parties to obtain documents and other records. Since IRS summonses can only be enforced by court order, the Tax Division plays an integral role in obtaining judicial enforcement of summonses. Successful enforcement often involves overcoming defenses to disclosure such as attorney-client privilege. The documents and customer lists produced allow the IRS to focus its investigations and identify potentially abusive transactions.

(3) Obtaining injunctions that shut down the promotion of fraudulent tax schemes

Promoters of tax scams are the ultimate "tax kingpins": Like drug dealers, they sell false hope to individuals, who are often in difficult circumstances. They prey on taxpayers on the low end of the tax-avoidance spectrum, seeking to sell "do-it-yourself" tax-relief packages to individuals (some who know better, some who are misled into illegal tax avoidance), using schemes and scams that are false and fraudulent. Many of these promotions grew to involve huge numbers of taxpayers, using the internet to market their schemes to large audiences who were previously unreachable or using sophisticated "boiler-room" telemarketing techniques. Beginning in 2001, the Tax Division has met head-on the onslaught of tax-scam promotions. Prior to or along with any criminal investigation, the Division uses civil enforcement remedies, primarily civil injunctions, which seek to halt to the promotion of the fraud and to require turnover of customer lists and documents. Division attorneys spend many hours preparing cases and collecting evidence, since obtaining an injunction virtually always requires proving the merits of the government's case at a preliminary stage, in advance of discovery.

(4) Winning criminal sanctions against illegal tax protesters, public tax scofflaws and prominent tax evaders

Along with its other criminal enforcement work, the Tax Division concentrates its resources on high-profile tax criminals who encourage others illegally to evade taxes. This includes those who advocate disobedience of the tax laws, those who publicize their refusal to comply with the law, and those who seek to garner a competitive advantage through tax evasion or who otherwise violate the law with impunity.

(5) Finding and bringing to justice those who promote or use offshore bank accounts for illegal tax avoidance

As the Department's Strategic Plan acknowledges, "In a society that has become globalized and more technologically advanced, the opportunities for criminals to exploit have grown exponentially."[4] One of these opportunities has been the increased use of accounts in offshore "tax haven" countries, made more accessible through advances in the financial industry and the internet. The Tax Division is working closely with the IRS to identify holders of offshore accounts through civil actions seeking records from financial institutions and credit-card companies and to prosecute those account-holders who have committed U.S. tax violations.

c) Success of Operation Follow-Through to Date

(1) Tax Shelter Litigation

Tax Division victories in United States Courts of Appeals have established precedent that effectively shut down technical tax shelters estimated to have cost the Federal Treasury $11 billion.

(2) Summons Enforcement Litigation

Tax Division victories in summons enforcement litigation—in which courts uniformly have rejected claims of privilege as unfounded—have required accounting firms, law firms, and financial institutions involved in the promotion of tax shelters to turn their tax shelter files and customer lists over to the IRS.

(3) Tax Scam Injunctions

Over 100 injunctions have been entered against tax scam promoters, shutting down scams involving over 400,000 taxpayers and hundreds of millions of dollars.

(4) Tax Convictions

Tax prosecutions have resulted in convictions of tax protesters and scofflaws in the following cases:

- Walter ("Al") Thompson (sentenced 6 years) – business owner refused to pay taxes or withhold them from employees' wages; was the subject of a November 2000 New York Times front page article in which he publicly declared his refusal to comply with tax laws
- Anderson's Ark defendants (sentences of up to 20 years) – long-running promotion that facilitated, through offshore accounts, evasion of taxes on more than $120 million in taxable income
- Lynne Meredith (sentenced 10 years) – illegal tax protester associated with tax fraud group "We the People;" promoted bogus trust arrangements and assisted taxpayers in forming phony "pure trusts" to conceal income and assets from government

[4] Strategic Plan, ch. 1 at 4.

- Richard Simkanin (sentenced 7 years) – business owner refused to pay taxes or withhold them from employees' wages; one of five small business owners who published a full-page USA Today advertisement in March 2001 claiming there was no law requiring taxes to be withheld from employees
- Richard Flowers (sentenced 4 years) – operated "warehouse bank" scheme for 14 years, enabling customers to conduct anonymous banking transactions using numbered accounts, using funds commingled in a single commercial bank account

(5) Tax Prosecutions

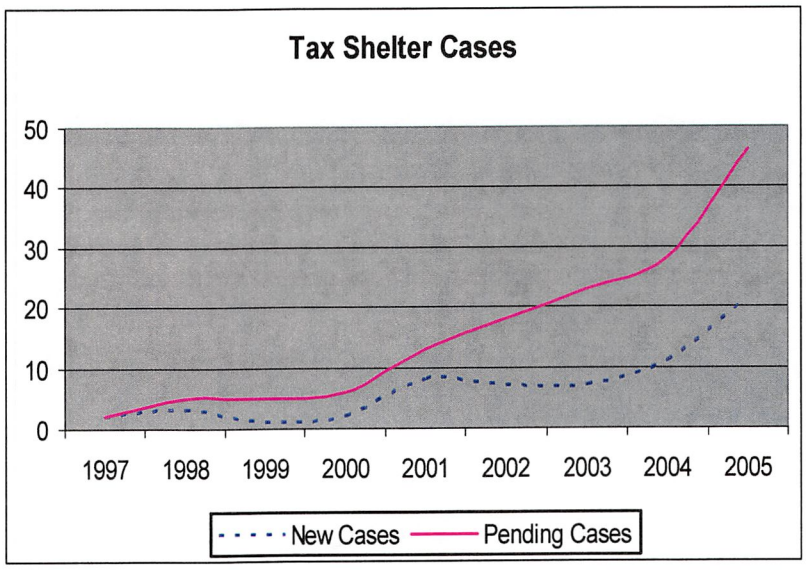
The Tax Division has also secured indictments against the following defendants:

- Irwin Schiff – Indictment charges Schiff and two conspirators with aiding and assisting the filing of false tax returns, tax evasion and willful failure to file tax returns. Schiff was previously convicted of tax crimes twice before. Indictment alleges that conspirators promoted the filing of fraudulent returns reporting zeroes on each income and expense line, often resulting in full refund of federal taxes withheld.
- Walter Anderson – Indictment charges Anderson with tax evasion, obstruction of the IRS and defrauding District of Columbia government, by failing to pay well in excess of $200 million in taxes.
- The Aegis Company defendants – Indictment charges six defendants with a nearly decade-long conspiracy to market and sell sham domestic and foreign trusts through The Aegis Company to some 650 wealthy taxpayer clients throughout the United States in order to hide hundreds of millions of dollars in income, causing a tax loss to the United States of at least $68 million. Additional indictments in multiple jurisdictions charged certified public accountants and others with aiding and assisting the preparation and filing of false tax returns by Aegis trust clients.

(6) Offshore Accounts

The Division's use of civil and criminal remedies to attack abuse of offshore accounts has resulted in the production of hundreds of thousands of bank records, identification of hundreds of potential violators and convictions of many users of offshore entities and bank accounts.

3. Growth in Division's Workload



Even as the Division focuses on tax kingpins, its workload is growing.

a) Litigation targeting tax kingpins is growing significantly

(1) 115% growth in tax shelter cases

From FY 2001 to FY 2004, tax shelter cases handled in the Division grew from 13 to 28, a 115% percent increase. The number of shelter cases skyrocketed in FY 2005, and now stands at 41, a 254% increase from FY 2001.

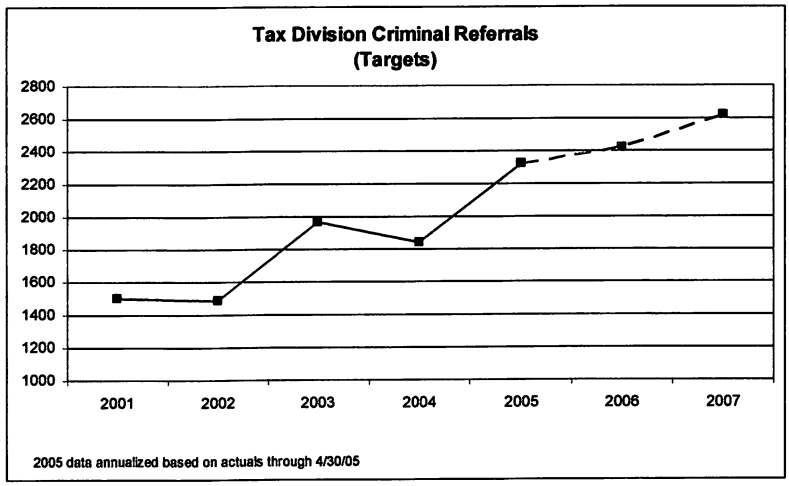
(2) 2
300% growth in tax scam injunction case filings

The number of scam promoter injunction suits filed by the Division from FY 2001 to FY 2004 increased by 2,000 percent; that figure is expected to increase to 2,300 percent by the end of FY 2005:[5]

Note: The decline in promoter referrals from 2004 to 2005 (projected) is due to the referral in 2004 of a single case involving 45 promoters. Referrals of tax scam promoters for injunction litigation is expected to continue at a high rate. Indeed, as of May 2005, the Division had a backlog of 84 promoters who had not yet been sued or otherwise acted upon.

b) In addition to pursuing tax kingpins, the Division is devoting resources to its growing caseload

- The Division's caseload grew 7.2 percent (from 14,631 to 15,691 cases) from FY 2004 to FY 2005
- In the first half of FY 2005, the Division's caseload's grew at an annual rate of 7.8 percent



[5] In 2001, the IRS referred 4 promoters to the Tax Division for institution of injunction proceedings; in 2005, it is projected to refer 106 promoters for injunction. The Division expects to file suit against 72 promoters in FY 2005, compared to 3 in FY 2001.

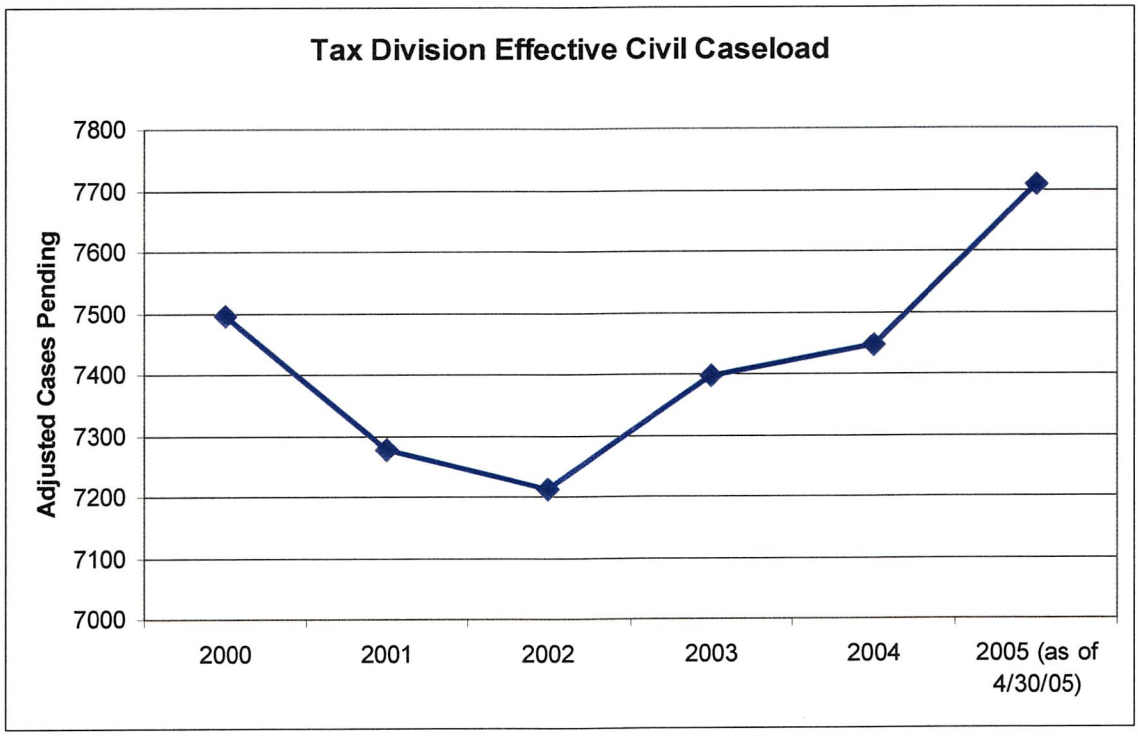
DOJ_NMG_0142581

- From 2001-2004, criminal referrals from the IRS grew 20%

The Division has seen significant growth in the number of criminal matters referred to the Division, and expects this growth to continue through FY 2007.

Based on current trends, the Division predicts receiving 2,618 criminal matter referrals in FY 2007.

c) The Division's workload is growing in other ways beyond an increasing number of cases

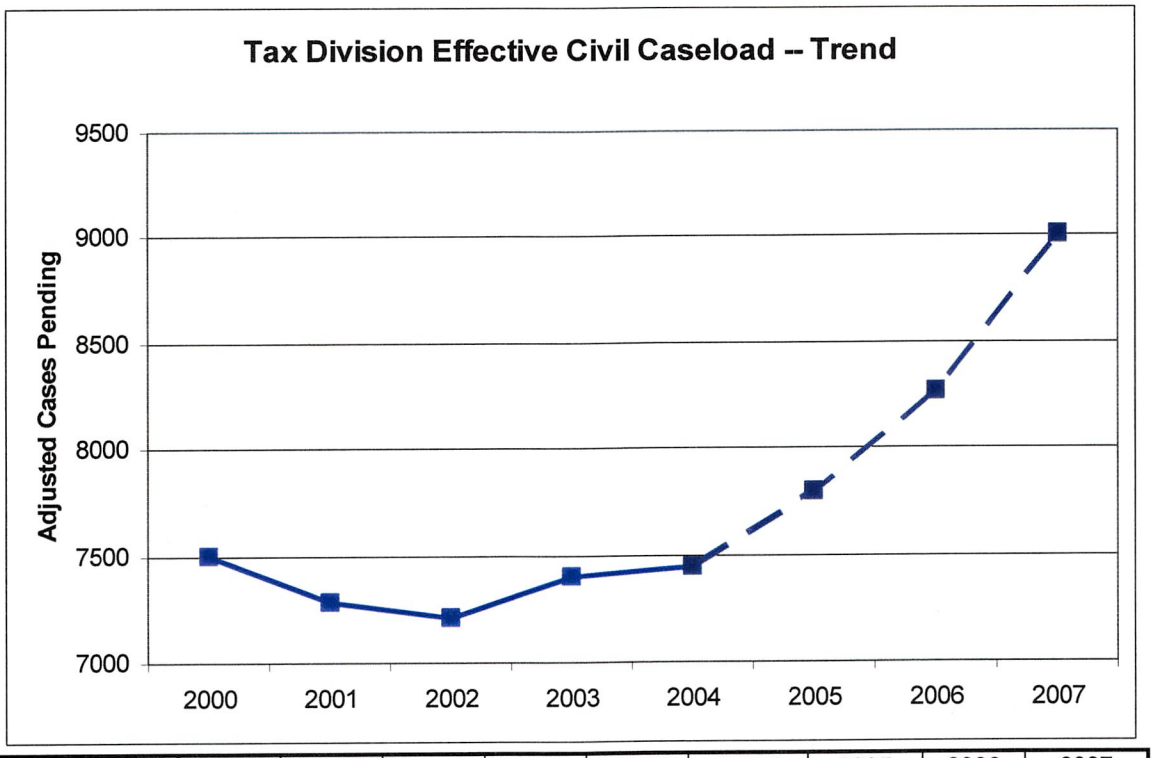


(1) As measured by increases in complex civil litigation

Tax shelter litigation constitutes perhaps the most complex civil litigation in courts today. The cases involve sophisticated, complex transactions devised by financial experts (some of them Nobel laureates in economics), executed in elaborate structures that seek to take advantage of perceived loopholes in the tax code. The litigation frequently entails hundreds of thousands of documents, multiple parties and witnesses, multiple jurisdictions, novel issues and well-financed opposition.

As illustrated by the chart above (page 7), the number of tax shelter cases being handled by the Tax Division has been increasing. Moreover, the number of hours that must be devoted to tax shelter cases far outstrips the hours devoted to other kinds of civil cases handled by the Division. Analysis of all of the 19 tax shelter cases handled to closure by the Division in recent years, or whose activity is substantially complete, shows that on average a tax shelter case consumes between 5,000 and 6,000 attorney hours to completion, over a span of 4 to 5 years. Assuming an average case takes 5,000 hours over a four-year period, the average annual attorney time needed for each shelter case is 1,250 hours. This is 30 times the average hours per case for other kinds of cases (44.5 hours per case), based on data for the last 5 years:

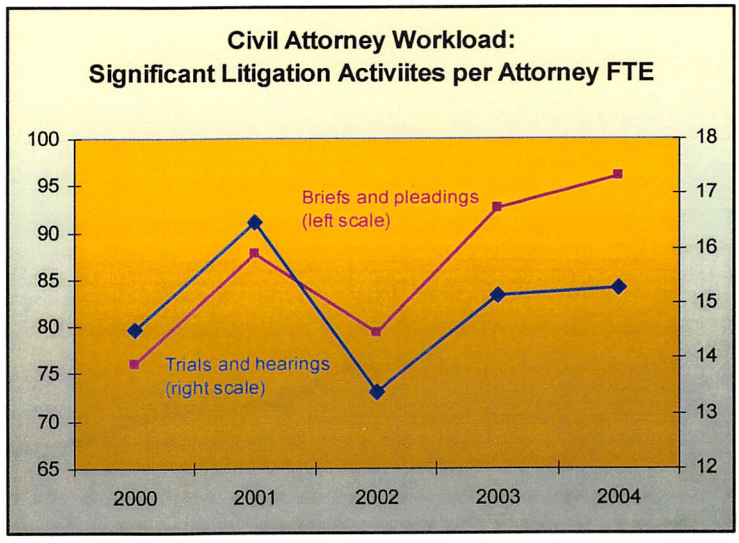
Hours Charged to All Types of Civil Cases
	2000	2001	2002	2003	2004
Pending Suits	7,320	6,900	6,690	6,758	6,663
Total Hours	336,376	312,574	312,991	308,952	257,018
Hours/Suit	46.0	45.3	46.8	45.7	38.6
				Average	44.5



Accordingly, each new shelter case is the equivalent of 30 new non-shelter cases handled by the Division. Because the number of new shelter cases is growing substantially, it is appropriate to analyze the current and projected civil workload of the Division in terms of number of shelter cases and number of non-shelter cases, and to treat the shelter cases as counting as 30 non-shelter cases, due to the additional time they take and the additional resource demands they create. This yields an "effective civil caseload" that provides a more accurate picture of resource demands than treating all cases as being equal. The charts below indicate that the Division's effective civil caseload has been growing:

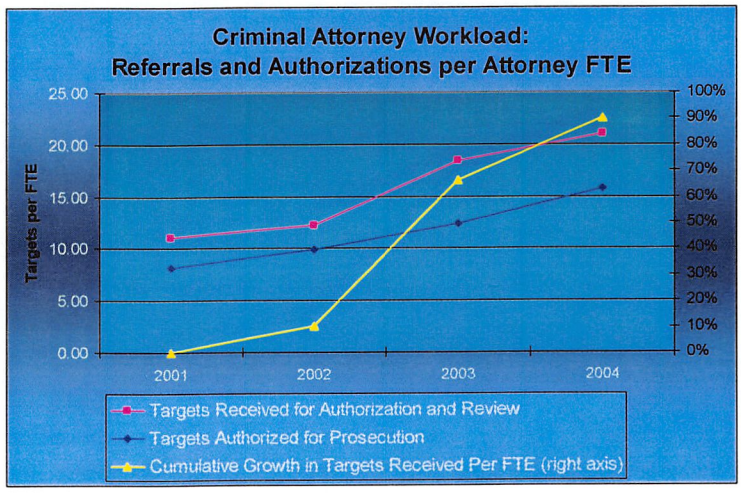
	2000	2001	2002	2003	2004	As of 4/30/05
All Cases	7320	6900	6690	6758	6663	6518
Shelter	6	13	18	22	27	41
Non-shelter	7314	6887	6672	6736	6636	6477
Shelter x 30	180	390	540	660	810	1230
Effective Caseload	7494	7277	7212	7396	7446	7707

Assuming current trends in shelter case growth continue, by FY 2007 the Division's effective caseload will be 25 percent larger than its 2002 nadir:



DOJ_NMG_0142583

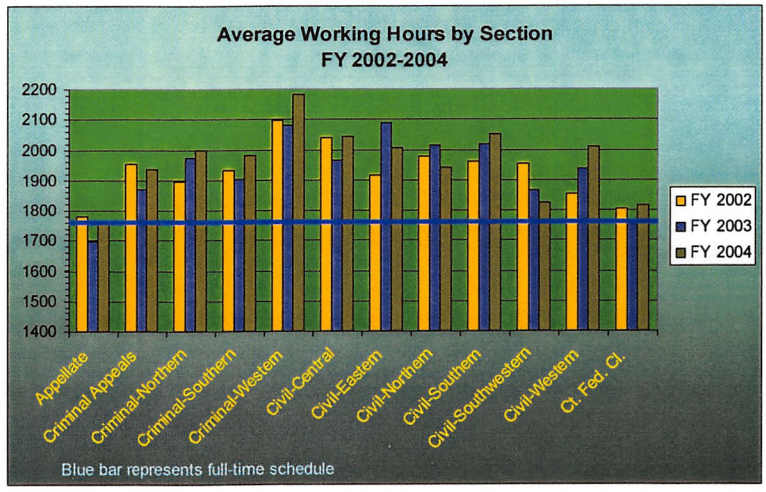
	2000	2001	2002	2003	2004	As of 4/30/05	2005 (proj)	2006 (proj)	2007 (proj)
All Cases	7320	6900	6690	6758	6663	6518	6448	6315	6185
Shelter	6	13	18	22	27	41	47	67	97
Non-shelter	7314	6887	6672	6736	6636	6477	6401	6248	6088
Shelter x 30	180	390	540	660	810	1230	1397	2017	2914
Effective Caseload	7494	7277	7212	7396	7446	7707	7798	8265	9002



(2) As measured by significant litigation activities per civil attorney FTE

The Division tracks the number of significant litigation activities performed by each attorney, both by the number of briefs, pleadings or other court documents prepared and by the number of trials or court hearings attended. As the Division's workload has increased, Division attorneys have been working harder to complete more significant litigation activities per year, as the graph illustrates.

(3) As measured by criminal referrals and authorized prosecutions per criminal attorney FTE



Similarly, on the criminal side, the Division tracks the number of criminal referrals made to the Division, per attorney FTE, and the number of prosecutions authorized. The number of criminal referrals received per attorney FTE in FY 2004 was 90 percent higher than that received in FY 2001. As workload has increased, Division attorneys have become more efficient, doubling the number of prosecutions authorized per attorney FTE by FY 2004. Nonetheless, the gap between targets referred and targets authorized has grown, suggesting that further efficiency gains would be difficult to realize.

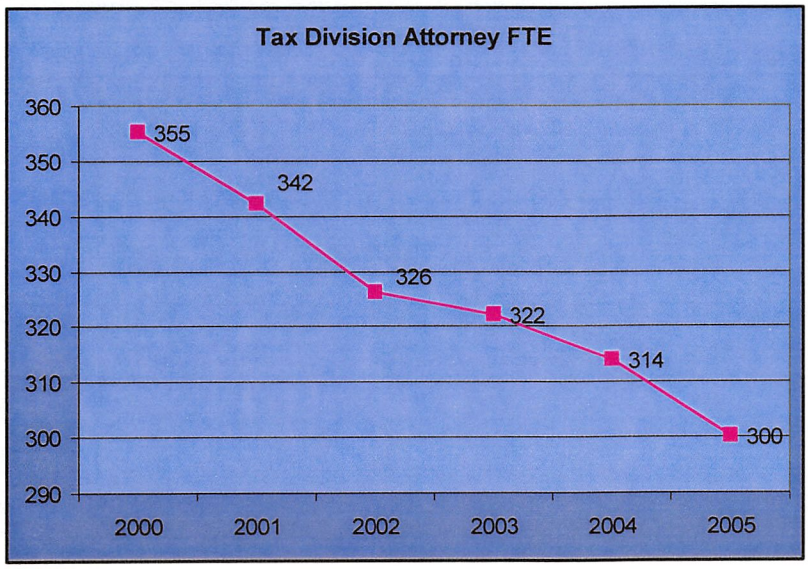
d) The capacity of attorneys to absorb additional growth is at its limit

Division attorneys worked an annual average of 1,950 hours in 2003, and 1,955 hours in 2004. This average yearly schedule is the equivalent of working nearly a whole extra month per year above a full-time schedule of 1,800 hours. The following chart shows the average hours worked per year in the last three fiscal years in each of the Division's sections:

Many attorneys put in many more hours than the average, working up to 2,500 or even 3,400 hours per year (3,120 hours per year is the equivalent of 10 hours per day, 6 days per week, 52 weeks per year).

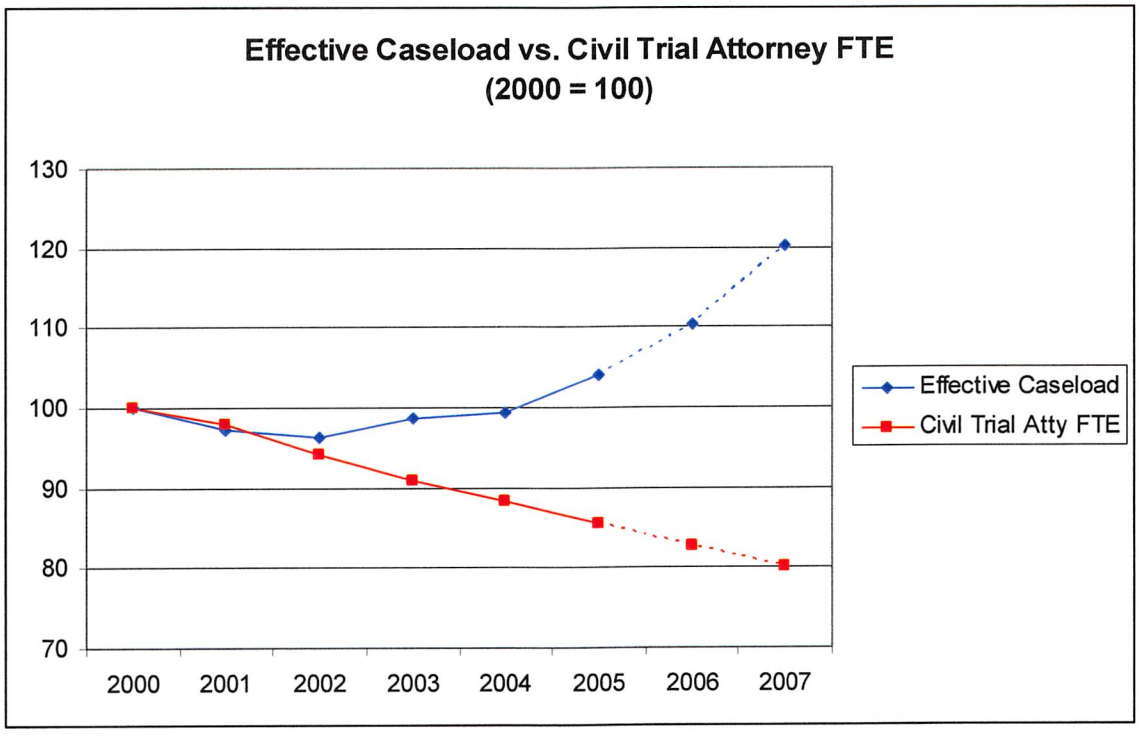


Tax Division attorneys are working to capacity, and can no longer absorb its growing workload.

4. Decline in Attorney FTE

a) The Division is losing many talented attorneys to the private sector and other government offices

Tax Division attorneys are in high demand in the private sector and in other government offices. Division attorneys entering private practice can double their government salary. Since the beginning of FY 2001, the Division has lost nearly 100 trial attorneys to law firms, U.S. Attorneys' offices and other agencies. Because of budget restrictions, the Division has been able to replace only 50 of these departures through the Honors Program and lateral hiring.



Of the attorneys lost since the beginning of FY 2001, 25 prosecutors from the Division's criminal enforcement sections have transferred to 15 U.S. Attorney's Offices. In addition, in FY 2004, three Honor's Program hires designated for the Division, prior to entry on duty, were reassigned by OARM to a U.S. Attorney's Office. While these 28 transfers have enhanced the strength of U.S. Attorney's Offices, they have severely diminished the strength of the Tax Division.

As of May 2005:

- Civil trial attorney FTE was at 158 (down from 194 in 2001, an 18.5 percent reduction)
- Criminal trial FTE was at 68 (down from 93 in 2001, a 27 percent reduction)
- Attorney staff had declined by 15.5% since 2000, representing a loss of 1 out of 6 attorneys

The following graph compares the percentage reduction in civil trial attorney FTE to the percentage growth in civil trial effective caseload, compared with FY 2000 levels:

5. Projected New Cases

In addition to the caseload the Division is attempting to manage with declining resources, the Division has already begun to receive dozens of new complex cases, the first of a significant number it anticipates receiving for next several years, requiring additional attorney and support staff.

a) IRS's enhanced enforcement activity is spawning hundreds of new cases from taxpayers who refuse to participate in its settlement initiatives

The IRS has made a priority of combating corrosive activity by corporations, high-income individuals and other contributors to the Tax Gap. In addition to stepping up audits, the IRS is making increasing use of "settlement initiatives," under which the IRS publicly states the terms to which it would agree to resolve disputes concerning the taxes (and penalties and interest) owing as a result of specific abusive transactions. Settlement initiatives are a useful enforcement tool, bringing in billions of dollars of unpaid taxes, interest and penalties and resolving hundreds of cases. The terms of recent IRS settlement initiatives have been very tough, requiring settling taxpayers to concede 100 percent of the taxes owing plus a portion of applicable penalties and interest. Nonetheless, thousands of taxpayers are accepting the terms proposed and paying billions of dollars.

Tax Division litigation directly supports the effectiveness of IRS settlement initiatives. Its summons enforcement litigation has required shelter promoters to turn over customer lists and transaction documents, permitting the IRS to identify shelter participants who otherwise might evade detection. Further, the Division's litigation challenging the merits of abusive tax shelters allows the IRS to assert the credible threat that shelter participants will lose in court, which encourages them to settle.

For example, in May 2004, the IRS made a settlement offer regarding the Son of Boss tax shelter, which has been used by wealthy individual taxpayers to eliminate multi-million dollar gains. As a condition of participating in the settlement program, the IRS required a total concession by the taxpayer of artificial losses claimed. The IRS also required the payment of penalties in most cases. As of April 14, 2005, 1,165 taxpayers (of the over 1,800 believed to have employed the Son of Boss technique) had participated in the settlement initiative, yielding $3.2 billion in taxes, interest, and penalties. The IRS anticipated that this figure will rise to approximately $3.5 billion when the program concluded.

Significantly, however, more than 600 of the 1,800 identified Son-of-Boss users did not participate in the settlement initiative. The IRS estimates that cases involving around 325 taxpayers will be litigated, and more than half of these are likely to be handled by the Tax Division (as taxpayers will be more likely to file suit in district court or the Court of Federal Claims, courts in which the Tax Division represents the United States, than in the Tax Court). To date in 2005, over 20 such cases have already been filed and are being litigated by the Tax Division, involving almost 100 taxpayers.

The IRS is promising to offer additional settlement initiatives. Indeed, in February 2005, the IRS implemented a new settlement initiative relating to an illegal tax shelter transaction under which taxpayers transferred executive stock options or restricted stock to family-controlled entities, sometimes at the expense of public shareholders. The settlement offer required full payment of taxes owed plus a penalty. Other initiatives involving tax-exempt entities may be offered. As of May 2005, the IRS estimated that at least 15 other tax shelter cases were headed for litigation, along with 33 other large cases that were important to tax administration.

b) New injunction cases

As of April 2005, the number of scam promoters being investigated by the IRS Lead Development Center had climbed to 1,266, up 25 percent from the beginning of the fiscal year and double the number pending at the beginning of FY 2004. Significant numbers of these cases are likely to be referred to the Division for civil injunctions. These new cases would come on top of the significant injunction work the Division is already handling.

c) Outgrowth of offshore work

As summarized below, as of May 2005, the IRS estimated that thousands of taxpayers identified through the Division's offshore enforcement litigation (seeking to enforce IRS summonses on credit-card issuers and processors to obtain information regarding U.S. holders of accounts in tax-haven countries) were in examination, or would be shortly. Hundreds of these cases are likely to be referred to the Division for further litigation or prosecution.

- 1317 cases have been selected for examination, but are waiting to be classified before they are sent to the field.

- 177 cases have been selected for examination and sent to the field, but have not been assigned to an agent.
- 338 cases have been assigned to a revenue agent, but no time has been charged to the case yet.
- 1423 cases are assigned to a revenue agent and are under examination.
- 474 cases have been examined and are in a post-audit status—e.g., a 30-day letter has been issued.
- Of the 1423 under examination, 391 cases have either been referred to IRS Criminal Investigation Division (CI) or CI has accepted the case. This is an exceptionally high percentage of referrals.

Without a substantially fortified attorney workforce, the Tax Division will be unable to litigate appropriately its current caseload, much less the hundreds of new cases expected to be filed by FY 2007.

6. Return on Investment

Not only are additional resources for tax litigation imperative to support the Administration's priorities, they are also an excellent investment. Over the last four years, Tax Division attorneys on average have returned 21 dollars to the Treasury for every dollar paid to them:

Return on Investment for Tax Division Attorneys

Collections in millions	$47	$90	$72	$69
Refund Suit Savings in millions	$769	$1,246	$794	$658
Total in millions	$815	$1,336	$866	$727
Attorney FTE	342	326	322	314
Dollars collected, refunds saved per attorney	$ 2,383,626	$ 4,096,626	$ 2,690,062	$ 2,315,287
Modular cost per attorney	$ 132,190	$ 134,280	$ 137,340	$ 141,000
Return on Investment per Attorney	18.03:1	30.51:1	19.59:1	16.42:1
Average				21.14:1

In addition, these returns on investment are based only the direct effect of the Tax Division's work. The cases the Division brings and wins, the precedent that the Division establishes and the convictions that the Division obtains profoundly affect taxpayer behavior, making the indirect effect of the Tax Division's work many billions of dollars more. Accordingly, provision of resources for the Tax Division more than repays for itself in revenue for the Federal Treasury.

7. Calculation of FTE Needed

The Division calculates its FTE request based on projected caseload for FY 2007 and the average hours per case needed to handle that caseload, calculated separately for civil matters and criminal matters.

The Division projects having 9,002 civil trial matters (adjusted for the complexity of tax shelter cases, as described at pages 8 to 11 above). The Division calculates that it spends an average of 44.5 hours per case per year in civil matters. Accordingly, the total hours needed (and the corresponding attorney FTE needed, assuming 1800 work hours per attorney FTE) for the projected case load is calculated as follows:

Civil	44.5	9002	400,272	222.37	157	65.37

For criminal matters, the Division projects receiving 2,618 criminal referrals. (See page 8.) Other than for cases for which the Division declines to authorize prosecution, each year an average of around 10 percent of referred matters are handled in litigation by Division prosecutors and 90 percent are sent to U.S. Attorneys' offices for handling, following Division review and authorization. In 2007, therefore, the Division expects to handle 262 litigated matters and 2,356 non-litigated matters.

Litigated matters require far more Division time and resources. As a result, the Division calculates the average hours per case for criminal matters separately for litigated matters and for non-litigated matters. For the last four years, the average hours per case per year is 348.6 hours for litigated cases, and 29.9 hours for non-litigated cases:

	Average Hours Per Case Per Year*				Average
	2001	2002	2003	2004
Cases with Litigation Assignments	276.4	350.4	357.8	409.6	348.6
Cases with No Litigation Assignment	30.4	31.6	28.4	29.0	29.9

*Litigated cases are assumed to be handled over 2 years

Applying these averages to the expected number of litigated and non-litigated cases in 2007 yields the caseload in hours and the FTE needed (using 1,800 hours/FTE):

	Average Hours/ Case	2007 Caseload Projection	Projected Caseload in Hours	FTE Needed (@1800 hours/FTE)	Baseline FY 2007 FTE	FTE Requested (Difference)
Criminal-Litigated Cases	348.6	262	91,246	50.69
Criminal-Non Litigated Cases	29.9	2356	70,363	39.09
Total				89.78	79	10.78

Accordingly, the Division requests 65 civil attorney FTE and 11 criminal attorney FTE, for a total of 76 attorney FTE.

DOJ_NMG_0142591

In addition, the Division seeks 30 support staff FTE, based on the following ratios of support staff to attorneys, developed in conjunction with the Division's 1997 restructuring:

	Ratio of Staff to Attorneys	Attorney FTE Requested	Support Staff FTE Requested
Paralegals	1 to 8	76	9.5
Litigation Assistants	1 to 4	76	19.0
Administrative Support			1.5
Total			30.0

The Forgotten Goal of Civil Justice: A Foundation for Common Sense in Daily Life

by Philip K. Howard

The debate over civil justice in recent decades has focused on its fairness. Tort reformers complain of "lawsuit abuse" and "judicial hell-holes."[1] Defenders of the current system talk of the need to protect the little guy against corporate abuses, and extol the jury system as "Democracy in Action."[2]

In this paper I argue that civil justice has a broader goal than fairness: to provide a foundation for reasonable choices in a free society. The main defect in the current system is not that juries are unfair or that there is an avalanche of litigation -- about which there is sharp disagreement[3] -- but that law does not offer predictable guidelines of who can sue for what. The system of justice offers recourse not only against abusive and negligent conduct, but also against conduct that most people consider reasonable. Civil justice tolerates, and arguably encourages, inconsistent verdicts for similar disputes. The law offers few guidelines on standards of care or on the potential exposure when there is a dispute.

The decline in traffic claims is attributable to the rise of no-fault insurance and other reforms designed to reduce the volume of those claims. Between 1975 and 2002, all tort claims increased a total of 38%, including the 9% decrease since 1992.)

Civil justice has changed markedly in 40 years.[4] These changes can be traced in part to a shift in judicial philosophy: whatever authority judges believed they held withered with the rise of the "legal process" movement in the 1960s, in which their role was reconceived as one of a neutral referee.[5] The effect was not to achieve neutrality, however, but to leave a vacuum. That vacuum has been filled by an ever-broadening range of private legal claims and threats, giving rise to a lawsuit culture in which ordinary interaction is now weighed down by legal considerations.

The main harm to society is not the total cost of verdicts, but that Americans no longer feel free to act reasonably. Legal fear has infected the culture. Paranoid doctors focus on avoiding lawsuits.[6] Recreational activities are cancelled.[7] Teachers have trouble maintaining

The solution I propose is not to set arbitrary limits on lawsuits but to shift responsibility back to judges to decide, as a matter of law, the boundaries of reasonable claims. To re-instill the public trust in civil justice, judges need to provide people with a sense of who can sue for what.

The authority of judges to assert social norms, although rarely discussed today, is well-established in common law jurisprudence, and was the central theme of those we hold up as lions of the common law, such as Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr. and Benjamin Cardozo. [11]

The question of what should be decided by a judge versus a jury, in truth, did not matter much until recent decades. Under prevailing social mores, it didn't occur to people to sue for ordinary accidents or workplace disagreements. But now that perception has radically changed: any disagreement or accident is a potential lawsuit.

The need to reassert judicial authority is not a matter of abstract preference for a particular judicial philosophy. The need to reassert judicial authority is profoundly practical: Because Americans no longer trust civil justice, they have lost their freedom to make reasonable daily choices.

"What really matters is this, that the judge is under a duty... to maintain a relation between law and morals, between the precepts of jurisprudence and those of reason and good conscience."

Civil justice is conceived today primarily as a dispute resolution mechanism. But civil justice also has a broader goal -- as the foundation for reasonable choices in a free society. Holmes stated that, "the first requirement of a sound body of law" is to uphold reasonable community norms. [12]

Lawsuits do not affect just the named parties to the litigation but, frequently, "the interests of society in general."[13] Derek Bok, former Harvard President and Law School Dean, observed that lawsuits "often have their greatest effect on people who are neither parties to the litigation nor even aware that it is going on." [14] The news last year that someone received a large verdict in a sledding accident had the natural effect of causing other towns to declare that they no would no longer permit winter sports on town property. [15] No court, however, made a ruling that sledding is an unreasonable risk. Who is representing the interests of the citizens who want to enjoy winter sports?

Our system of law is considered the foundation of a free society not because it allows claims over any disagreement to go to a jury, but because it sets forth legal duties that provide the guideposts defining the scope of our freedom. People feel free to interact reasonably with others because the system of law will put criminals in jail, enforce contracts by their terms, and require a negligent person to compensate the person injured. Civil law protects the good as well as prosecutes the bad: citizens in a free society should be confident that if they act reasonably, their freedom to do so will be defended. As long as you act within those guideposts, you are free: free to follow your star and act on your instincts simply because you choose to.[16]

The rule of law does not seek to maximize possible legal claims -- as one observer noted, "America did not sue its way to greatness"[17] -- but to define legal duties in a way that promotes our freedom. "The end of law," John Locke said, "is not to abolish or restrain, but to preserve freedom."[18]

Today, at least in areas such as tort law, America's civil justice system is not providing these guideposts of right and wrong. There exists a widespread perception, generally accurate, that any injured or angry person can haul another person into court over any accident or disagreement and put that claim to a jury.LC There is also a perception that the amounts for which people may sue, if not unlimited, are subject to amorphous guidelines and few limits.

[16] Prosser and Keeton note that an essential aspect of freedom is being free from "restraint and ...undue consideration for the interests and claims of others." See Prosser and Keeton, supra:

> Individuals have many interests for which they claim protection from the law, and which the law will recognize as worthy of protection...Individuals wish to be secure in their persons against harm and interference, not only as to their physical integrity, but as to their freedom to move about and their peace of mind. They want food and clothing, homes and land and goods, money, automobiles and entertainment, and they want to be secure and free from disturbance in the right to have these things, or to acquire them if they can. They want freedom to work and deal with others, and protection against interference with their private lives, their family relations, and their honor and reputation. They are concerned with freedom of thought and action, with opportunities for economic gain, and with pleasant and advantageous relations with others. The catalogue of their interests might be as long as the list of legitimate human desires; and not the least of them is the desire to do what they please without restraint and without undue consideration for the interests and claims of others.

The operating assumption of current legal orthodoxy is that the availability of a lawsuit encourages people to act reasonably. Indeed, by making people potentially liable for their negligence, law provides incentives for reasonable conduct. What people seem to have forgotten is that the converse is also true: Allow lawsuits against reasonable behavior and pretty soon people no longer feel free to act reasonably.

An "open season" conception of justice has enormous appeal if people are thinking of getting back at others or looking for comfort in blaming others, but it also has infected daily interaction in society with distrust. People understand, as Professor Robert Kagan observed, that this sue-for-anything approach to justice "can be used against the trustworthy, too. An equal opportunity weapon, it can be invoked by the misguided, the mendacious, and the malevolent, as well as by the mistreated."[19]

The ultimate test of a system of justice, Justice Cardozo suggested, is how people feel about it.[20] By that standard, civil justice is not only a failure, but is actively tearing at the fabric of our society.

Distrust of Justice and Social Decline

In almost every area of social interaction, Americans no longer feel free to act reasonably. The effects of this distrust have been subject of extensive studies in healthcare, which have concluded that the legal system is a prime contributor to the crisis of cost and quality. Doctors and nurses no longer feel comfortable acting on their best judgment or being candid with

- It is the ubiquitous practice of physicians to order tests that they do not believe are medically necessary, driving up the costs of healthcare.[21] Defenders of this practice say that more tests mean better healthcare, but 45 million Americans lack health insurance in part because individuals and small businesses cannot afford healthcare premiums that have skyrocketed.[22]
- Health care expenditures per person are projected to reach $6,477 per person in 2005. U.S. spending per person is "just over" double that of persons in Canada, France, Germany, Italy, Japan, and the United Kingdom.[23]
- The Institute of Medicine has concluded that "patient safety is also hindered through the liability system and the threat of malpractice."[24] Doctors are scared to be candid with each other, leading to unnecessary and often tragic errors. They avoid using email because it leaves a written record. They are reluctant to admit fault even in cases of near misses, where no harm is done to the patient.

- In a 2002 Harris Poll, 78% of physicians admitted ordering unnecessary tests and 94% said that other physicians did.[25] A recent survey in Pennsylvania found that 93% reported practicing defensive medicine, and 92% reported ordering unneeded tests and diagnostic procedures and making unnecessary referrals.[26]
- The legal system makes it difficult to hold bad doctors accountable. Doctors who make mistakes can drag out litigation for years, often compelling an unfair settlement. Inept doctors often successfully avoid efforts to revoke their licenses by hiring a lawyer and threatening to sue for defamation.

LcDistrust of the legal system has transformed public schools. Teachers struggle to maintain order in the classroom because they face threats of being dragged into hearings. The degradation of the school culture, as described by Prof. Richard Arum in his book, Judging School Discipline, is linked to requirements to "prove" the correctness of decisions in an adversarial proceeding.[27] The disrespect accorded teachers is shocking. Polls and focus groups show that educators will do almost anything to avoid the unpleasantness of legal hearings. In America today, teachers will not put an arm around a crying child for fear of being sued for an unwanted sexual touching. LC

Recreation has been transformed. Playgrounds have been stripped of anything athletic—for example, jungle gyms and even seesaws. Playgrounds are so boring, according to some experts, that no child over the age of four wants to go in them.[28] I was on a panel convened by Health Secretary Tommy Thompson in 2002, at which a group of experts concluded that re-instilling a culture of physical fitness was essential in order to address the surge in childhood obesity. Forty years ago, JFK's President's Council on Youth Fitness, with the same goal, called for installing monkey bars and other athletic equipment in playgrounds. Now, because of fear of liability, they've largely been ripped out.

Many other ordinary aspects of growing-up have disappeared. Lakes were closed to swimming as the word got out that you might get sued. Field trips are cancelled.[29] 'Recently, a school in Brooklyn had their beach day near Coney Island—the children were prohibited from going in the water for fear that someone might be liable if there were an accident.[30] A new book,

Business life has been transformed in many ways. "Foreign businessmen express amazement," Derek Bok observed, at "a system that exposes the entrepreneur to legal challenge so easily and on so many fronts, a system that lends itself so readily to harassment, obstruction, and delay."

It is the regular practice of firms, including my own law firm, not to give references for fear of liability. Last year, a nurse admitted to killing 42 people in hospitals in New Jersey and Pennsylvania but continued to get rehired because no one would give him a bad reference. The hospitals did not know he was a murderer, but each knew that he was a troubled person and an ineffective nurse, and fired him. But when the nurse applied for a job at a hospital down the road, the prior employer would not give a negative referral, but only confirm his prior employment. As one hospital administrator admitted, "we're prevented from telling one another what we know out of fear, quite frankly, of being sued."[32]

Symptoms of the distrust of justice are all around us. Warning labels are found on virtually every product. Billions of coffee cups contain the helpful legend "Caution: Contents are Hot." A recent winner of the annual "wacky warning" contest was a 5-inch fishing lure with the following legend: "Harmful if Swallowed."[33] The warnings cost little or nothing, apologists say. But that's not correct either. When every product has a warning, the effect is a version of the child crying wolf -- consumers are less likely to pay attention to the warnings that really matter.

In almost all areas of social interaction -- hospitals, schools, recreation, child-rearing activities, even churches and synagogues -- Americans no longer feel comfortable acting on their reasonable judgment. The reason, polls confirm, is distrust of American Justice. A new Harris Poll, commissioned for this conference, found the following:

- 76% of Americans strongly or somewhat agree that people have become so fearful of frivolous lawsuits that they are discouraged from performing normal activities. [34]
- 83% of Americans strongly or somewhat agree that the system of justice makes it too easy to make invalid claims. [35]
- 94% strongly or somewhat agree that there is a tendency for people to threaten legal action when something goes wrong.[36]
- 16% trust the legal system if someone makes a baseless claim against them.[37]

The lack of confidence in civil justice is echoed in numerous other polls. [38] In a

Defenders of our system of justice say that Americans are irrational, and that the crisis has been manufactured (i) by irresponsible media that makes headlines of occasional rogue jury verdicts and (ii) by a calculated scare campaign of tort reformers. It's correct that the media emphasizes anything that might shock or titillate the public.[42] This bad habit has been observed in the media since colonial days, and, in the land of the First Amendment, it is hard to know what to do about it. It is correct also that reformers have gone of the stump to tell the public that the litigation system is unfair.[43]

There is significant factual dispute over the amount of litigation and the trend in verdicts. The data are notoriously unreliable because fewer than 3% of all cases ever get resolved at trial, and the overwhelming number of claims are settled or disposed of in some other way.[45] Legal threats don't show up in the numbers at all. The best data appear to confirm that the amounts awarded by juries continues to increase and that the number of claims—at least of certain types— is also up.[46]

for example, if a baseless claim is brought, that the system of justice will affirmatively protect them. Economic theorists were wrong, as it turns out, that people are rational actors. In the face of uncertainty, individuals often give disproportionate weight to risk—psychologists Daniel Kahneman and Amos Tversky famously explained this phenomenon as the "overweighting of low probabilities."[51]

This theory helps to explain why people think about sharks before swimming in the ocean, even though chances of being bitten are negligible.[52] The prospect of litigation is a similarly horrifying fear, and there are many more potential plaintiffs in our immediate daily lives than there are sharks. Many doctors, for example, say that they view every patient as a potential plaintiff. Americans understand that one injured or disappointed person can unilaterally drag you through a legal process for years.

The phenomenon of legal fear appears to be that, once people learn that someone was exposed to a lawsuit for some ordinary life activity, that activity becomes a risk to avoid.[53] I could find no court that held that a seesaw was unreasonably dangerous, or that putting suntan lotion on children would subject you to liability, but Americans now understand someone could make the claim.LC That risk is one that Americans increasingly will not take.[54]

What is important is not that the claim reaches an adverse verdict. What seems to be important is that a viable legal claim is available. "An act is illegal," Professor Donald Black once observed, "if it is vulnerable to legal action." By that standard almost any accident or dispute is illegal. Nothing could be easier to come up with a theory of what someone might have done differently and present it to the jury.

Recently, the jury found the Catholic Archdiocese of Milwaukee liable because a volunteer for a Catholic lay organization, driving her own car, ran a red light and caused an accident while delivering a statue of the Virgin Mary to an invalid. Although the church does not direct the meetings of this group, called the Legion of Mary, its meetings are held on church property. The jury decided the Archdiocese should pay $17 million to the paralyzed victim, an 82 year-old man.[55]

Reasonable people can argue about whether volunteer organizations should be liable for the driving of volunteers. But the effect of the case is predictable: there will be a chill on volunteer activities because no one knows the contours of liability. Why take the risk?

Getting Beyond Tort Reform

The debate over "tort reform" in the last two decades has focused not on the effectiveness of justice as the foundation for reasonable daily choices, but whether civil justice achieves fairness in particular cases.[56] As Derek Bok noted 20 years ago, there is a tendency to [56] Those engaged in the current tort reform debate would do well to heed Geoffrey Hazard's advice that "In all law reform it is important to be circumspect about the nature and magnitude of the problems to which reform is to be addressed." Geoffrey C. Hazard, Jr., Individual Justice in a Bureaucratic World, 7 Tul. J. Int'l & Comp. L. 73 (1999). To properly tackle the problems in the current system, it is important to take a broader view of the effect of civil justice on society.

concentrate on the "plight of individual litigants and ignore[] the effects on the system as a whole."[57]

Tort reformers talk about the "lawsuit lottery," and point to jurisdictions that are notoriously tilted toward claimants and characterize them as "judicial hell-holes" and "magic jurisdictions" where plaintiffs' lawyers can bring baseless or excessive claims with a high probability of success.[58] The focus throughout is fairness. "Is it fair to get a couple of million dollars from a restaurant because you spilled a cup of hot coffee on yourself?"[59] As the Chamber of Commerce asks on its website, "How fair are your courts?"[60]

Actual reform proposals have not questioned the basic functioning of the system, however. As Professor Robert Kagan put it, tort reform has only "nibbled at the edges."[61] Indeed, many tort reformers have gone out of their way to suggest that the problem can be fixed with a few tweaks: "all it takes is a few of those magic jurisdictions to distort the whole system,"[62] said a representative of the National Association of Manufacturers. "A minor change in procedures—the class action bill now pending before Congress—can make that impossible by driving those kinds of mass claims into federal court."[63] (That legislation—the Class Action Fairness Act of 2005—was passed earlier this year.)

The medical profession has thrown its energy into an effort to "cap" non-economic damages at $250,000. If ever enacted, this would certainly moderate malpractice insurance premiums. But doctors acknowledge that "caps" do little to alleviate the extreme distrust that doctors harbor towards the system. For example, limiting damages awarded for pain and suffering is of little help to an obstetrician who could not have caused a baby's birth defects but is nonetheless found liable for millions of dollars of "economic" damages representing a lifetime of care.[64]

Where tort reformers see the system as rigged by trial lawyers, opponents of reform portray tort reformers as special interests trying to rig the system their way. Joanne Doroshow, a founder of the Center for Justice and Democracy, put it this way: "there has been an increase in efforts to eviscerate the civil justice system and make sure corporations do not get sued for anything they do wrong." [65]

Opponents of tort reform also focus on fairness, which they define as the right to have every case decided by a jury. Robert S. Peck, the head of the Center for Constitutional Litigation, extols the virtues of modern civil justice this way:

> There, an individual, neither wealthy nor well-connected, can haul a huge multinational conglomerate into court and hold it accountable for its wrongful and harmful actions.[66]

"I trust the jury system and I trust the American people and their common sense," as trial lawyer Richard Scruggs put it, "far more than the National Association of Manufacturers to protect the American public."[67]

The focus on fairness has proved unproductive on many levels. In any given case, the question of fairness can easily be argued either way. Take the McDonald's hot coffee case, the poster child of "lawsuit abuse." There, an elderly woman was badly burned when she put her coffee cup between her legs, and it spilled as her daughter drove away from the drive-through window. That's her fault, it's easy to say. On the other hand, McDonald's coffee was brewed - 20 degrees hotter than other restaurants, and hundreds of people had complained over the years. McDonald's countered by arguing that hot coffee brews better and stays warm longer—with annual sales of over one billion cups, McDonald's hot coffee enjoys a significant measure of market acceptance. But why should the drive-in window sell coffee that's so hot? Why not, aren't drivers grown up?

Arguing about fairness quickly turns into a version of a playground spat. (Yes, it is. No, it isn't.) This is, more or less, the state of the tort reform debate. Tort reformers talk about the need to limit frivolous lawsuits. Who can be against that? Defenders of the system

The populist rhetoric by trial lawyers about "trust the American people" doesn't seem quite accurate. As Walter Olson recounts in vivid detail in "The Rule of Lawyers" (Truman Talley/St. Martin's 2003) entrepreneurial lawyers practice discrimination overtly; manuals explain that Mexican Americans are "passive" and "Orientals tend to go along with the majority." The plaintiff lawyers use focus groups to figure out which juries would be most sympathetic to their arguments. In the silicone breast implant cases, for example, they discovered that blue collar men who like big bosoms would be most likely, out of guilt, to return verdicts for the plaintiffs. cite.

talk about protecting the little guy against corporate wrongdoers. Who can be against that?

Any functional system of civil justice, of course, should accomplish both goals: it should reliably get rid of frivolous lawsuits, and it should also effectively protect the little guy against a corporate wrongdoer. What's missing in the debate is any coherent vision of how a system of justice should work. The impact of justice on the workings of a society is only touched on tangentially. Plaintiffs' lawyers often assert that lawsuits serve a "regulatory function." But it's hard to identify the regulatory rule when results vary from case to case, 'the trial lawyers simply assume (contrary to substantial evidence)LC[68] that the more exposure to liability, the better people will behave.

While both sides can endlessly argue about the fairness of the current system, it is hard to argue the fact that Americans distrust justice and, as a result, no longer feel free to act on their reasonable judgment. The key question is how to fix the system.

The Responsibility of Judges vs. Juries.

> ...ad questionem juris non respondent juratores.
> "...jurors do not answer questions of law."
> Sir Edward Coke, Commentary on Littleton 460 (J. H. Thomas ed., 1818).

Just as both sides to the tort reform debate have focused on fairness rather than the broader effects of civil justice on society, so too have they assumed that juries, not judges, have the responsibility of deciding whether conduct constitutes negligence or an unreasonable risk. Under current judicial orthodoxy, judges believe they should lean over backwards to put every case to a jury. One standard often quoted is Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41 (1957) admonishing lower courts not to dismiss any claim unless "it appears beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to recover."[69]

Any effort at legal reform is routinely resisted as trespassing on the constitutional right of trial by jury. [quote from plaintiff's lawyer.] But the role of the civil jury is generally misunderstood and, to the public, probably confused with the jury's role in criminal cases. In criminal prosecutions, juries play a critical role as our protection against the abuses of government power. Juries are our defense against state coercion: no one can be convicted to jail unless a jury decides they're guilty. But in a civil case, where citizens can use the justice system as an offensive weapon, the role of the jury depends upon whether the issues should be determined as a matter of law or as a matter of disputed fact.

The Seventh Amendment, which states that the "right of trial by jury shall be preserved," underscores this fact-law distinction. It defines the civil jury right as applying to "suits in common law" and ends by saying that "no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise reexamined...than according to the rules of the common law."[70] Judges declare the standards of law that affect all of society; juries find disputed facts in the particular case.[71]

Rev. 982, 1083 (2003). (Positing that an issue that "involves the resolution of principles generally applicable to a class of cases" is a question of law for the judge). See also Walter Dellinger & H. Jefferson Powell, Marshall's Questions, 2 Green Bag 367 (1999) (Commenting that "Marshall the judge seems memorable for his insistence that the courts deal only and impartially with questions of law")

While most lawyers assume today that the Seventh Amendment is an automatic pass to the jury, what constituted a "suit at common law" in 1791 was sharply limited. There was no cause of action for negligence, for example, until judges in the 19th century made rulings creating this new cause of action. Some issues -- say, interpretation of a statute -- are clearly law. Others are clearly issues of fact: "credibility determinations, the weighing of evidence and the drawing of legitimate inferences from the facts are jury functions, not those of a judge."[72]

Determining whether someone acted reasonably involves mixed questions of law and fact. Any claim for negligence, for example, usually involves what is reasonable conduct in the circumstances. The almost universal practice in tort cases is to give the claim to the jury. One study found that courts show "extreme vigilance against treading on contested fact issues or mixes questions of law and fact - even arguable ones - reserving them for evidentiary hearings . . .. This was especially true in cases applying indeterminate legal standards, such as reasonableness."[73] Most courts do not even pay attention to the question of what should be decided as a matter of fact or law.

> There has been ... a strong tendency to let all issues go to the jury without discriminating among them. Judges may see this not only as conventional, but also as convenient, because it reduces judicial effort and the risk of reversal.[74]

The general practice of American courts is summed up by a sign that once hung over the federal courtroom door in New Orleans: "No spitting. No summary judgment."[75]

There is a different conception of civil justice that, at least in tort law, would dramatically increase the responsibility of judges. In this tradition, articulated most notably by Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., the overriding goal of civil justice is to provide guidance and protection to society as a whole: Instead of acting as referees over a neutral process, judges have the obligation to make rulings of law on legal duty and standards of care. Whether seesaws are a reasonable risk would be determined by the judge as a matter of law.

This approach has been largely lost to our generation and to most probably seems like heresy. But the jurists that we hold up as our leading common law thinkers considered this an essential responsibility of judges. To Holmes, what constitutes reasonable conduct was a question that required a ruling of law:

> Negligence ... [is] a standard of conduct, a standard we hold the parties bound to know before-hand, and which in theory is always the same fact and not a matter dependent upon the whim of a particular jury nor the eloquence of the particular advocate.[76]

Benjamin Cardozo devoted his famous lectures in 1923 to the importance of this type of "judicial legislation":

> The judge is under a duty...to maintain a relation between law and morals, between precepts of jurisprudence and those of reason and good conscience. "it is the function of courts to keep doctrines up to date with the mores by continued restatement...This is judicial legislation, and the judge legislates at his peril. Nevertheless, it is the necessity and duty of such legislation that gives to judicial office its highest honor; and no brave and honest judge shirks the duty or fears the peril."[77]

emphasized the need for judges to declare rulings even in the simplest accident, and not leave standards to the "oscillating verdicts of juries."[79] When a woman hit her head on an angled ceiling while walking down a staircase, Traynor insisted that the judge determine whether it was an unreasonable hazard; in that case, "the danger is so apparent that visitors could reasonably be expected to notice it."[80]

Judges in tort claims today assume that they lack this power, but they need only look to commercial law to see the philosophy at least partially in action. In commercial law, the focus is predictability and efficiency. It is a well-established principle that judges, not juries, have the obligation to interpret standard language of contracts.[81] The Uniform Commercial Code was a legislative effort to achieve consistency.[82] Its core concepts, including ones that look very much like those of tort, including reasonableness, are often decided as a matter of law in situations where the fact patterns are likely to be repeated. America's system of commercial law, generally considered the most consistent and predictable in the world, is the bedrock of

America's economic strength.[83]

The Supreme Court in recent years has begun to emphasize the goal of legal consistency. Several important decisions, for example, emphasized the desirability of judges using summary judgment to make rulings as a matter of law. In Celotex v. Caltrett, a wrongful death asbestos case, the court starkly shifted direction from the presumption that summary dismissal should be avoided if there was a "scintilla of evidence."[84] Thus,

> Summary judgment procedure is properly regarded not as a disfavored procedural shortcut, but rather as an integral part of the federal rules as a whole, which are designed "to secure the just, speedy and inexpensive determination of every action." (quoting Fed. Rules Civ. Proc. 1.)[85]

In Markman v. Westview Instruments, Justice Souter explained the importance of consistency in patent cases:

> "...we see the importance of uniformity in the treatment of a given patent as an independent reason to allocate all issues of construction to the court. As we noted in General Elec. Co. v. Wabash Appliance Corp., "[t]he limits of a patent must be known for the protection of the patentee, the encouragement of the inventive genius of others and the assurance that the subject of the patent will be dedicated ultimately to the public."[86]

What discourages economic energy, Justice Souter cautioned, was a legal system that created a

In State Farm v. Campbell, the court went further on punitive damages, suggesting clear guidelines so that claims of punitive damages could not be used to extort settlements.[89]

> Elementary notions of fairness enshrined in our constitutional jurisprudence dictate that a person receive fair notice not only of the conduct that will subject him to punishment, but also of the severity of the penalty that a State may impose." testimony from jury to judge:

> ...the Rules of Evidence -- especially Rule 702 -- do assign to the trial judge the task of ensuring that an expert's testimony both rests on a reliable foundation and is relevant to the task at hand.[91]

Professor Arthur Miller, in a thorough article on the history of the fact-law distinction, is critical of what he sees as a new trend to make decisions as a matter of law on summary judgment. His main point, it seems, is that judges should not be allowed to draw on their values:

> "Judges are human, and their personal sense of whether a plaintiffs' claim seems "implausible" can subconsciously infiltrate even the most careful analysis."[92]

The idea of "result-oriented" decisions based on considerations of policy strikes Professor Miller as basically unlawful. When deciding cases as a matter of law before trial.

> ...lower courts may curtail litigants' access to trials - and obviously a jury - through arbitrary, result-oriented, or efficiency-motivated determinants at the pretrial motion stage.[93]

At bottom, Professor Miller trusts juries more than judges and seems to subscribe to Senator John Edwards' idea that juries are "Democracy in Action." Civil justice is conceived as a kind of mini-election, with decisions made jury by jury, on an ad hoc basis.

But Holmes and Cardozo did not necessarily think that judges are wiser than juries. Their point is that juries can't make consistent rulings of what is reasonable care and what is not. Juries have no authority make rulings at all. Every case is a blank slate. The effect is that civil law offers no predictability or guidance.

Professor Miller is correct that, in making rulings of law, judges will necessarily have to draw on their sense of community values. Cardozo agreed that a judge can never "eliminate altogether the personal measure of the interpreter," but explained that society can't function without a ruling by someone:

> You may say there is no assurance that judges will interpret the mores of their day more wisely and truly than other men. I am not disposed to deny this, but in my view it is quite beside the point. The point is rather that this power of interpretation must be lodged somewhere...[94]

Holmes famously defined law as "The prophecies of what the courts will do in fact."[95] Today in America, in areas such as tort law, no one has any idea of what a court will do. What that means, I submit, is that in these areas Americans have lost the protection of law.

"The basic moral principle, acknowledged by every legal system we know anything about," Yale Professor Eugene Rostow once observed, "is that similar cases should be decided alike."[96] To accomplish that goal, judges must take the responsibility to draw the boundaries of reasonable lawsuits. Sooner or later, as Derek Bok observed, "our legal system [must] empower someone to keep watch and make sure that the process as a whole is meeting the needs of those whom it purportedly serves."[97]

Restoring Reliability to Civil Justice:

Times have changed.

In many ways, the changes have been for the better. The shift in legal philosophy that began in the 1960s opened doors for broad segments of society. In an effort to avoid abuses of authority, however, we undermined the authority needed to make common choices needed to run the institutions of society, including the system of civil justice.

We have created a society obsessed with law. Legal threat, once a rare event in anyone's life, is now commonplace. A recent Public Agency survey found that 78% of middle and high-school teachers in American had been threatened by their students with possible violation of their legal rights.[98] The debate over civil justice cannot take place by putting a magnifying glass over a particular dispute. Arguments about fairness, or homilies about the common sense of juries,[99] do nothing to confront the reality that legal fear has become a defining feature of our culture.

Other countries are beginning to have a similar problem of legal fear (perhaps influenced by American culture) and are proposing solutions. British Prime Minister Tony Blair recently gave a speech pointing to how fear of possible lawsuits has resulted in counterproductive behavior in England: "something is seriously awry when teachers feel unable to take children on school trips, for fear of being sued" or when a town "remove[d] hanging baskets for fear that they might fall on someone's head, even though no such accident has occurred in the 18 years they had been hanging there."[100]

The problem in the UK occurs not because of erratic juries -- the UK long ago abolished juries in most civil cases[101]-- but because judges are not focusing on the social policy implications of allowing certain claims. In an important decision in 2003, the Appellate Committee of the House of Lords took this issue on, and discussed the responsibility of judges to consider policy when deciding whether to permit claims.[102]

The case before the House of Lords could have been picked from many courts in America. On a hot day in the Cheshire region of England, a 18 year-old named John Tomlinson went for a swim in the lake of a local park.[103] Racing into the water from the beach, he dived too sharply and broke his neck on the sandy bottom. He was paralyzed for life.[104]

Mr. Tomlinson sued the Cheshire County Council for not doing more to protect against the accident. The Council, he discovered, knew about the risk. There were three or four near drownings every year. "No swimming" signs had been posted and widely ignored for over a decade. The popularity of the park—more than 160,000 visitors every year—made effective policing almost impossible. Fearful of liability, the Cheshire Council had decided to close off the lake by dumping mud on the beaches and planting reeds. But before the reeds could be planted Mr. Tomlinson had his accident. The Cheshire Council should have acted sooner, as his lawyer argued, to prevent "luring people into a deathtrap"[105] and to protect against a "siren sound strong enough to turn stout men's hearts."[106] The lower court accepted this argument because the County obviously knew the danger.

The Law Lords took the appeal and ordered the case to be dismissed. The lead opinion by Lord Hoffmann declared that whether a claim should be allowed hinged not just on whether an accident is foreseeable, but "also the social value of the activity which gave rise to the risk."[107] Permitting Mr. Tomlinson's claim, the Law Lords held, means that hundreds of thousands of people would not be able to enjoy the park: "[T]here is an important question of freedom at stake. It is unjust that the harmless recreation of responsible parents and children with buckets and spades on the beaches should be prohibited in order to comply with what is thought to be a legal duty."[108]

The County's ineffective effort to prevent swimming, instead of establishing negligence, the Lords held, demonstrated how a misguided conception of justice hurts the public. "Does the law require that all trees be cut down," Lord Hobhouse asked, "because some youth may climb them and fall?"[109] Lord Scott added, "Of course there is some risk of accidents.... But that is no reason for imposing a grey and dull safety regime on everyone."[110] have lost sight that lawsuits concern not only the particular parties to the dispute, but everyone in society.[111] The mere possibility of a lawsuit changes people's behavior.

Protecting the freedom of everyone in society requires a basic shift in responsibility. Judges must delineate the boundaries of claims that implicate social policy. Judges must act as gatekeepers, as Holmes and Cardozo advocated, giving legal substance to general standards.[112]

This shift in responsibility is intended to accomplish two goals. It will spawn a body of legal opinions on standards of care and scope of duty that will begin to establish the contours of reasonable dispute. Most citizens don't eagerly await judicial slip opinions, of course, to learn how to behave. The more immediate benefit will be that the public will know that judges now see it as their job affirmatively to defend reasonable conduct.

The rule of thumb for when a legal ruling is needed should probably be this: if allowing a claim (or defense) to proceed to a jury would affect people not in the courtroom, then [111] In recent years, several state Supreme Courts have emphasized the importance of public policy in making rulings of law in tort cases. In a case involving a mugging on a town beach at night, the California Supreme Court ruled that the town should not be liable because, imposing tort liability "admonishes against any use of the property whatever, thus effectively closing the area." Hayes v. State of California, 11 Cal. 3d. 469, 473 (1974). The California Supreme Court also dismissed a claim that a touch football participant was too rough because "imposition of legal liability for such conduct might well alter fundamentally, the nature of the sport." the judge should make a ruling of law as to the contours of the claim. Are the risks inherent in a public lake ones that society should take? Avoiding this ruling is not neutral. Not ruling, in effect, is a decision to close the lake. It doesn't matter if the jury finds no liability, because the next jury may feel differently.

Shifting this responsibility to judges to make these rulings does not implicate serious concerns of judicial authority, at least if we accept that judges in civil cases are empowered to make rulings of law based on legal policy considerations. The precedents are numerous and several state supreme courts have begun to limit tort claims on this basis. [113] Nor is there any obvious need for procedural tools other than those that already exist, such as summary judgment.[114]

Important judicial rulings, even from the Supreme Court, are unlikely to effect a quick change in the way most courts handle cases.[115] The power of inertia is always underestimated, and the Supreme Court has learned many times that doctrinal shift does not necessarily occur because it says it should.

Legislation would be even more powerful in making lower courts, and the public at large, understand that justice sets boundaries. Prime Minister Blair recently announced that he will propose a new Compensation Bill that will "clarify the existing law on negligence to make clear that there is no liability in negligence for untoward incidents that could not be avoided by taking reasonable care or exercising reasonable skill."[116] Such a bill, Prime Minister Blair proposed, "will send a strong signal and...reduce risk-averse behavior by providing reassurance to those who may be concerned about possible litigation, such as volunteers, teachers and local authorities."[117]

The significance of the proposed legislation in the UK will probably not be to provide clear legislative answers,[118] but to shift the goal of civil justice. Instead of focusing only on fairness and foreseeability in a particular case, judges will likely be called upon to make rulings, as in Tomlinson, based on "considerations of social advantage."[119]

Legislation to make the shift in judicial philosophy could be in the form of a general principle, along the following lines:

> Judges shall take the responsibility of drawing the boundaries of reasonable dispute as a matter of law, applying common law principles and statutory guidelines. In making these rulings, judges should consider the impact of allowing such claims (or defenses) on the conduct of broader society.

Legislation could also address specific areas of crisis. Congress has already introduced a bill to authorize pilot projects for administrative health courts, with hearings in the Senate expected

Law is a conservative institution, as it should be. The shift towards judicial responsibility will only occur after leaders of bench and bar, exercising their considerable powers of skepticism, reach their own understanding of why this change is essential. Some of the concerns, however, can be predicted.

All citizens are entitled to their day in court, many will observe. I would go further: the courthouse doors should never be barred, even to frivolous claims. The pertinent question is how far the claim goes, i.e., whether it is subject to dismissal by motion with a legal ruling.[121] What I advocate is not taking away the right to sue, but giving substance to the right to sue.

Conservatives may object that this is "judicial activism." But there is a difference between a judge assuming legislative functions, such as taking control of a school system, and a judge dismissing an unreasonable private claim. A kind of defensive activism, where judges act as gatekeepers, is essential to keep private parties from using justice unilaterally to undermine the freedom of others in society.

The main concern, I suspect, will focus on what is called "the right to sue." The mischief caused by civil justice in the last 40 years has sustained itself so long, in my view, because of a false assumption about the nature of civil justice. Pretty much everyone seems to believe there is a constitutional right to sue for almost everything.

Suing is not an act of freedom, however. The rights of freedom that our founders gave us, such as freedom of speech, were rights against state power. Suing invokes the state's coercive power against another private citizen--if you lose, the marshal will come and take your home away. Suing is just like indicting someone, except that it is an indictment for money. We would never tolerate a prosecutor bringing a baseless charge. Nor would we allow a prosecutor to threaten the death penalty for a misdemeanor.[122] That would be using state power for extortion. Why, then, do we tolerate allowing self-interested private parties to invoke legal power for whatever they want against other free citizens?

An "open season" philosophy of justice does not enhance our constitutional rights. The point of freedom was almost exactly the opposite--that we can live our lives without being cowed by state power. When private parties use the threat of state power for their private benefit, without any moderating judicial authority, justice becomes a tool for extortion. That's why legal fear in America has reached epidemic proportions.

Shifting the responsibility to draw boundaries of claims to judges is a major doctrinal change, comparable in scope to the shifts that occurred in the 1960s. But the shift must be of bold proportions to restore the public's trust in its ability to begin using common sense again. The stakes could hardly be higher, as is apparent from any tour of the daily functioning of America's common institutions. Before making changes this dramatic, we should be cautious. But is there any other way to deal with the lawsuit culture that is tearing at the fabric of freedom?

THE NATURE OF THE JUDICIAL PROCESS

Lecture I. Introduction. The Method of Philosophy.

THE work of deciding cases goes on every day in hundreds of courts throughout the land. Any judge, one might suppose, would find it easy to describe the process which he had followed a thousand times and more. Nothing could be farther from the truth. Let some intelligent layman ask him to explain: he will not go very far before taking refuge in the excuse that the language of craftsmen is unintelligible to those untutored in the craft. Such an excuse may cover with a semblance of respectability an otherwise ignominious retreat. It will hardly serve to still the pricks of curiosity and conscience. In moments of introspection, when there is no longer a necessity of putting off with a show of wisdom the uninitiated interlocutor, the troublesome problem will recur, and press for a solution. What is it that I do when I decide a case? To what sources of information do I appeal for guidance? In what proportions do I permit them to contribute to the result? In what proportions ought they to contribute? If a precedent is applicable, when do I refuse to follow it? If no precedent is applicable, how do I reach the rule that will make a precedent for the future? If I am seeking logical consistency, the symmetry of the legal structure, how far shall I seek it? At what point shall the quest be halted by some discrepant custom, by some consideration of the social welfare, by my own or the common standards of justice and morals? Into that strange compound which is brewed daily in the caldron of the courts, all these ingredients enter in varying proportions. I am not concerned to inquire whether judges ought to be allowed to brew such a compound at all. I take judge-made law as one of the existing realities of life. There, before us, is the brew. Not a judge on the bench but has had a hand in the making. The elements have not come together by chance. Some principle. however unavowed and inarticulate and subconscious, has regulated the infusion. It may not have been the same principle for all judges at any time, nor the same principle for any judge at all times. But a choice there has been, not a submission to the decree of Fate; and the considerations and motives determining the choice, even if often obscure, do not utterly resist analysis. In such attempt at analysis as I shall make, there will be need to distinguish between the conscious and the subconscious. I do not mean that even those considerations and motives which I shall class under the first head are always in consciousness distinctly, so that they will be recognized and named at sight. Not infrequently they hover near the surface. They may, however, with comparative readiness be isolated and tagged, and when thus labeled are quickly acknowledged as guiding principles of conduct. More subtle are the forces so far beneath the surface that they cannot reasonably be classified as other than subconscious. It is often through these subconscious forces that judges are kept consistent with themselves, and inconsistent with one another. We are reminded by William James in a telling page of his lectures on Pragmatism that every one of us has in truth an underlying philosophy of life, even those of us to whom the names and the notions of philosophy are unknown or anathema. There is in each of us a stream of tendency, whether you choose to call it philosophy or not,[1] which gives coherence and direction to thought and action. Judges cannot escape that current any more than other mortals. All their lives, forces which they do not recognize and cannot name, have been tugging at them—inherited instincts, traditional beliefs, acquired convictions; and the resultant is an outlook on life, a conception of social needs, a sense in James's phrase of "the total push and pressure of the cosmos," which, when reasons are nicely balanced, must determine where choice shall fall.

[1] Cf. N. M. Butler, "Philosophy," pp. 18, 43.

In this mental background every problem finds its setting. We may try to see things as objectively as we please. None the less, we can never see them with any eyes except our own. To that test they are all brought—a form of pleading or an act of parliament, the wrongs of paupers or the rights of princes, a village ordinance or a nation's charter.

I have little hope that I shall be able to state the formula which will rationalize this process for myself, much less for others. We must apply to the study of judge-made law that method of quantitative analysis which Mr. Wallas has applied with such fine results to the study of politics.[2] A richer scholarship than mine is requisite to do the work aright. But until that scholarship is found and enlists itself in the task, there may be a passing interest in an attempt to uncover the nature of the process by one who is himself an active agent, day by day, in keeping the process alive. That must be my apology for these introspective searchings of the spirit.

Before we can determine the proportions of a blend, we must know the ingredients to be blended. Our first inquiry should therefore be: Where does the judge find the law which he embodies in his judgment? There are times when the source is obvious. The rule that fits the case may be supplied by the constitution or by statute. If that is so, the judge looks no farther. The correspondence ascertained, his duty is to obey. The constitution overrides a statute, but a statute, if consistent with the constitution, overrides the law of judges. In this sense, judge-made law is secondary and subordinate to the law that is made by legislators. It is true that codes and statutes do not render the judge superfluous, nor his work perfunctory and mechanical. There are gaps to be filled. There are doubts and ambiguities to be cleared. There are hardships and wrongs to be mitigated if not avoided. Interpretation is often spoken of as if it were nothing but the search and the discovery of a meaning which, however obscure and latent, had none the less a real and ascertainable pre-existence in the legislator's mind. The process is, indeed, that at times, but it is often something more. The ascertainment of intention may be the least of a judge's troubles in ascribing meaning to a statute. "The fact is," says Gray in his lectures on the "Nature and Sources of the Law,"[3] "that the difficulties of so-called interpretation arise when the legislature has had no meaning at all; when the question which is raised on the statute never occurred to it; when what the judges have to do is, not to determine what the legislature did mean on a point which was present to its mind, but to guess what it would have intended on a point not present to its mind, if the point had been present."[4] So Brütt:[5] "One weighty task of the system of the application of law consists then in this, to make more profound the discovery of the latent meaning of positive law. Much more important, however, is the second task which the system serves, namely the filling of the gaps which are found in every positive law in greater or less measure." You may call this process legislation, if you will. In any event, no system of jus scriptum has been able to escape the need of it. Today a great school of continental jurists is pleading for a still wider freedom of adaptation and construction. The statute, they say, is often fragmentary and ill-considered and unjust. The judge as the interpreter for the community of its sense of law and order must supply omissions, correct uncertainties, and harmonize results with justice through a method of free decision—"libre recherche scientifique." That is the view of Gény and Ehrlich and Gmelin and others.[6] Courts are to "search for light among the social elements of every kind that are the living force behind the facts they deal with."[7] The power thus put in their hands is great, and subject, like all power, to abuse; but we are not to flinch from granting it. In the long run "there is no guaranty of justice," says Ehrlich,[8] "except the personality of the judge."[9] The same problems of method, the same contrasts between the letter and the spirit, are living problems in our own land and law. Above all in the field of constitutional law, the method of free decision has become, I think, the dominant one today The great generalities of the constitution have a content and a significance that vary from age to age. The method of free decision sees through the transitory particulars and reaches what is permanent behind them. Interpretation, thus enlarged, becomes more than the ascertainment of the meaning and intent of lawmakers whose collective will has been declared. It supplements the declaration, and fills the vacant spaces, by the same processes and methods that have built up the customary law. Codes and other statutes may threaten the judicial function with repression and disuse and atrophy. The function flourishes and persists by virtue of the human need to which it steadfastly responds. Justinian's prohibition of any commentary on the product of his codifiers is remembered only for its futility.[10]

I will dwell no further for the moment upon the significance of constitution and statute as sources of the law. The work of a judge in interpreting and developing them has indeed its problems and its difficulties, but they are problems and difficulties not different in kind or measure from those besetting him in other fields. I think they can be better studied when those fields have been explored. Sometimes the rule of constitution or of statute is clear, and then the difficulties vanish. Even when they are present, they lack at times some of that element of mystery which accompanies creative energy. We reach the land of mystery when constitution and statute are silent, and the judge must look to the common law for the rule that fits the case. He is the "living oracle of the law" in Blackstone's vivid phrase. Looking at Sir Oracle in action, viewing his work in the dry light of realism, how does he set about his task?

The first thing he does is to compare the case before him with the precedents, whether stored in his mind or hidden in the books. I do not mean that precedents are ultimate sources of the law, supplying the sole equipment that is needed for the legal armory, the sole tools, to borrow Maitland's phrase,[11] "in the legal smithy." Back of precedents are the basic juridical conceptions which are the postulates of judicial reasoning, and farther back are the habits of life, the institutions of society, in which those conceptions had their origin, and which, by a process of interaction, they have modified in turn.[12] None the less, in a system so highly developed as our own, precedents have so covered the ground that they fix the point of departure from which the labor of the judge begins. Almost invariably, his first step is to examine and compare them. If they are plain and to the point, there may be need of nothing more. Stare decisis is at least the everyday working rule of our law. I shall have something to say later about the propriety of relaxing the rule in exceptional conditions. But unless those conditions are present, the work of deciding cases in accordance with precedents that plainly fit them is a process similar in its nature to that of deciding cases in accordance with a statute. It is a process of search, comparison, and little more. Some judges seldom get beyond that process in any case. Their notion of their duty is to match the colors of the case at hand against the colors of many sample cases spread out upon their desk. The sample nearest in shade supplies the applicable rule. But, of course, no system of living law can be evolved by such a process, and no judge of a high court, worthy of his office, views the function of his place so narrowly. If that were all there was to our calling, there would be little of intellectual interest about it. The man who had the best card index of the cases would also be the wisest judge. It is when the colors do not match, when the references in the index fail, when there is no decisive precedent, that the serious business of the judge begins. He must then fashion law for the litigants before him. In fashioning it for them, he will be fashioning it for others. The classic statement is Bacon's: "For many times, the things deduced to judgment may be meum and tuum, when the reason and consequence thereof may trench to point of estate."[18] The sentence of today will make the right and wrong of tomorrow. If the judge is to pronounce it wisely, some principles of selection there must be to guide him among all the potential judgments that compete for recognition.

In the life of the mind as in life elsewhere, there is a tendency toward the reproduction of kind. Every judgment has a generative power. It begets in its own image. Every precedent, in the words of Redlich, has a "directive force for future cases of the same or similar nature."[14] Until the sentence was pronounced, it was as yet in equilibrium. Its form and content were uncertain. Any one of many principles might lay hold of it and shape it. Once declared, it is a new stock of descent. It is charged with vital power. It is the source from which new principles or norms may spring to shape sentences thereafter. If we seek the psychological basis of this tendency, we shall find it, I suppose, in habit.[15] Whatever its psychological basis, it is one of the living forces of our law. Not all the progeny of principles begotten of a judgment survive, however, to maturity. Those that cannot prove their worth and strength by the test of experience are sacrificed mercilessly and thrown into the void. The common law does not work from pre-established truths of universal and inflexible validity to conclusions derived from them deductively. Its method is inductive, and it draws its generalizations from particulars. The process has been admirably stated by Munroe Smith: "In their effort to give to the social sense of justice articulate expression in rules and in principles, the method of the lawfinding experts has always been experimental. The rules and principles of case law have never been treated as final truths, but as working hypotheses, continually retested in those great laboratories of the law, the courts of justice. Every new case is an experiment; and if the accepted rule which seems applicable yields a result which is felt to be unjust, the rule is reconsidered. It may not be modified at once, for the attempt to do absolute justice in every single case would make the development and maintenance of general rules impossible; but if a rule continues to work injustice, it will eventually be reformulated. The principles themselves are continually retested; for if the rules derived from a principle do not work well, the principle itself must ultimately be re-examined."[16]

[18] "Essay on Judicature."

[16] Munroe Smith, "Jurisprudence," Columbia Uni-

The way in which this process of retesting and reformulating works may be followed in an example. Fifty years ago, I think it would have been stated as a general principle that A. may conduct his business as he pleases, even though the purpose is to cause loss to B., unless the act involves the creation of a nuisance.[17] Spite fences were the stock illustration, and the exemption from liability in such circumstances was supposed to illustrate not the exception, but the rule.[18] Such a rule may have been an adequate working principle to regulate the relations between individuals or classes in a simple or homogeneous community. With the growing complexity of social relations, its inadequacy was revealed. As particular controversies multiplied and the attempt was made to test them by the old principle, it was found that there was something wrong in the results, and this led to a reformulation of the principle itself. Today, most judges are inclined to say that what was once thought to be the exception is the rule, and what was the rule is the exception. A. may never do anything in his business for the purpose of injuring another without reasonable and just excuse.[19] There has been a new generalization which, applied to new particulars, yields results more in harmony with past particulars, and, what is still more important, more consistent with the social welfare. This work of modification is gradual. It goes on inch by inch. Its effects must be measured by decades and even centuries. Thus measured, they are seen to have behind them the power and the pressure of the moving glacier.

We are not likely to underrate the force that has been exerted if we look back upon its work. "There is not a creed which is not shaken, not an accredited dogma which is not shown to be questionable, not a received tradition which does not threaten to dissolve."[20] Those are the words of a critic of life and letters writing forty years ago, and watching the growing scepticism of his day. I am tempted to apply his words to the history of the law. Hardly a rule of today but may be matched by its opposite of yesterday. Absolute liability for one's acts is today the exception; there must commonly be some tinge of fault, whether willful or negligent. Time was, however, when absolute liability was the rule.[21] Occasional reversions to the earlier type may be found in recent legislation.[22] Mutual promises give rise to an obligation, and their breach to a right of action for damages. Time was when the obligation and the remedy were unknown unless the promise was under seal.[23] Rights of action may be assigned, and the buyer prosecute them to judgment though he bought for purposes of suit. Time was when the assignment was impossible, and the maintenance of the suit a crime. It is no basis today for an action of deceit to show, without more, that there has been the breach of an executory promise; yet the breach of an executory promise came to have a remedy in our law because it was held to be a deceit.[24] These changes or most of them have been wrought by judges. The men who wrought them used the same tools as the judges of today. The changes, as they were made in this case or that, may not have seemed momentous in the making. The result, however, when the process was prolonged throughout the years, has been not merely to supplement or modify; it has been to revolutionize and transform. For every tendency, one seems to see a counter-tendency; for every rule its antinomy. Nothing is stable. Nothing absolute. All is fluid and changeable. There is an endless "becoming." We are back with Heraclitus. That, I mean, is the average or aggregate impression which the picture leaves upon the mind. Doubtless in the last three centuries, some lines, once wavering, have become rigid. We leave more to legislatures today, and less perhaps to judges.[25] Yet even now there is change from decade to decade. The glacier still moves.

In this perpetual flux, the problem which confronts the judge is in reality a twofold one: he must first extract from the precedents the underlying principle, the ratio decidendi; he must then determine the path or direction along which the principle is to move and develop, if it is not to wither and die.

The first branch of the problem is the one to which we are accustomed to address ourselves more consciously than to the other. Cases do not unfold their principles for the asking. They yield up their kernel slowly and painfully. The instance cannot lead to a generalization till we know it as it is. That in itself is no easy task. For the thing adjudged comes to us oftentimes swathed in obscuring dicta, which must be stripped off and cast aside. Judges differ greatly in their reverence for the illustrations and comments and side-remarks of their predecessors, to make no mention of their own. All agree that there may be dissent when the opinion is filed. Some would seem to hold that there must be none a moment thereafter. Plenary inspiration has then descended upon the work of the majority. No one, of course, avows such a belief, and yet sometimes there is an approach to it in conduct. I own that it is a good deal of a mystery to me how judges, of all persons in the world, should put their faith in dicta. A brief experience on the bench was enough to reveal to me all sorts of cracks and crevices and loopholes in my own opinions when picked up a few months after delivery, and reread with due contrition. The persuasion that one's own infallibility is a myth leads by easy stages and with somewhat greater satisfaction to a refusal to ascribe infallibility to others. But dicta are not always ticketed as such, and one does not recognize them always at a glance. There is the constant need, as every law student knows, to separate the accidental and the non-essential from the essential and inherent. Let us assume, however, that this task has been achieved, and that the precedent is known as it really is. Let us assume too that the principle, latent within it, has been skillfully extracted and accurately stated. Only half or less than half of the work has yet been done. The problem remains to fix the bounds and the tendencies of development and growth, to set the directive force in motion along the right path at the parting of the ways.

The directive force of a principle may be exerted along the line of logical progression; this I will call the rule of analogy or the method of philosophy; along the line of historical development; this I will call the method of evolution; along the line of the customs of the community; this I will call the method of tradition; along the lines of justice, morals and social welfare, the mores of the day; and this I will call the method of sociology.

I have put first among the principles of selection to guide our choice of paths, the rule of analogy or the method of philosophy. In putting it first, I do not mean to rate it as most important. On the contrary, it is often sacrificed to others. I have put it first because it has, I think, a certain presumption in its favor. Given a mass of particulars, a congeries of judgments on related topics, the principle that unifies and rationalizes them has a tendency, and a legitimate one, to project and extend itself to new cases within the limits of its capacity to unify and rationalize. It has the primacy that comes from natural and orderly and logical succession. Homage is due to it over every competing principle that is unable by appeal to history or tradition or policy or justice to make out a better right. All sorts of deflecting forces may appear to contest its sway and absorb its power. At least, it is the heir presumptive. A pretender to the title will have to fight his way.

Great judges have sometimes spoken as if the principle of philosophy, i.e., of logical development, meant little or nothing in our law. Probably none of them in conduct was ever true to such a faith. Lord Halsbury said in Quinn v. Leathem, 1901, A. C. 495, 506: "A case is only an authority for what it actually decides. I entirely deny that it can be quoted for a proposition that may seem to follow logically from it. Such a mode of reasoning assumes that the law is necessarily a logical code, whereas every lawyer must acknowledge that the law is not always logical at all."[26] All this may be true, but we must not press the truth too far. Logical consistency does not cease to be a good because it is not the supreme good. Holmes has told us

[26] Cf. Bailhache, J., in Belfast Ropewalk Co. v. Bushell, 1918, 1 K. B. 210, 213: "Unfortunately or fortunately, I am not sure which, our law is not a science."

in a sentence which is now classic that "the life of the law has not been logic; it has been experience."[27] But Holmes did not tell us that logic is to be ignored when experience is silent. I am not to mar the symmetry of the legal structure by the introduction of inconsistencies and irrelevancies and artificial exceptions unless for some sufficient reason, which will commonly be some consideration of history or custom or policy or justice. Lacking such a reason, I must be logical, just as I must be impartial, and upon like grounds. It will not do to decide the same question one way between one set of litigants and the opposite way between another. "If a group of cases involves the same point, the parties expect the same decision. It would be a gross injustice to decide alternate cases on opposite principles. If a case was decided against me yesterday when I was defendant, I shall look for the same judgment today if I am plaintiff. To decide differently would raise a feeling of resentment and wrong in my breast; it would be an infringement, material and moral, of my rights."[28] Everyone feels the force of this sentiment when two cases are the same. Adherence to precedent must then be the rule rather than the exception if litigants are to have faith in the even-handed administration of justice in the courts. A sentiment like in kind, though different in degree, is at the root of the tendency of precedent to extend itself along the lines of logical development.[29] No doubt the sentiment is powerfully reinforced by what is often nothing but an intellectual passion for elegantia juris, for symmetry of form and substance.[30] That is an ideal which can never fail to exert some measure of attraction upon the professional experts who make up the lawyer class. To the Roman lawyers, it meant much, more than it has meant to English lawyers or to ours, certainly more than it has meant to clients. "The client," says Miller in his "Data of Jurisprudence,"[31] "cares little for a 'beautiful' case! He wishes it settled somehow on the most favorable terms he can obtain." Even that is not always true. But as a system of case law develops, the sordid controversies of litigants are the stuff out of which great and shining truths will ultimately be shaped. The accidental and the transitory will yield the essential and the permanent. The judge who moulds the law by the method of philosophy may be satisfying an intellectual craving for symmetry of form and substance. But he is doing something more. He is keeping the law true in its response to a deep-seated and imperious sentiment. Only experts perhaps may be able to gauge the quality of his work and appraise its significance. But their judgment, the judgment of the lawyer class, will spread to others, and tinge the common consciousness and the common faith. In default of other tests, the method of philosophy must remain the organon of the courts if chance and favor are to be excluded, and the affairs of men are to be governed with the serene and impartial uniformity which is of the essence of the idea of law.

You will say that there is an intolerable vagueness in all this. If the method of philosophy is to be employed in the absence of a better one, some test of comparative fitness should be furnished. I hope, before I have ended, to sketch, though only in the broadest outline, the fundamental considerations by which the choice of methods should be governed. In the nature of things they can never be catalogued with precision. Much must be left to that deftness in the use of tools which the practice of an art develops. A few hints, a few suggestions, the rest must be trusted to the feeling of the artist. But for the moment, I am satisfied to establish the method of philosophy as one organon among several, leaving the choice of one or the other to be talked of later. Very likely I have labored unduly to establish its title to a place so modest. Above all, in the Law School of Yale University, the title will not be challenged. I say that because in the work of a brilliant teacher of this school, the late Wesley Newcomb Hohfeld, I find impressive recognition of the importance of this method, when kept within due limits, and some of the happiest illustrations of its legitimate employment. His treatise on "Fundamental Conceptions Applied in Judicial Reasoning" is in reality a plea that fundamental conceptions be analyzed more clearly, and their philosophical implications, their logical conclusions, developed more consistently. I do not mean to represent him as holding to the view that logical conclusions must always follow the conceptions developed by analysis. "No one saw more clearly than he that while the analytical matter is an indispensable tool, it is not an all-sufficient one for the lawyer."[32] "He emphasized over and over again" that "analytical work merely paves the way for other branches of jurisprudence, and that without the aid of the latter, satisfactory solutions of legal problems cannot be reached."[33] We must know where logic and philosophy lead even though we may determine to abandon them for other guides. The times will be many when we can do no better than follow where they point.

Example, if not better than precept, may at least prove to be easier. We may get some sense of the class of questions to which a method is adapted when we have studied the class of questions to which it has been applied. Let me give some haphazard illustrations of conclusions adopted by our law through the development of legal conceptions to logical conclusions. A. agrees to sell a chattel to B. Before title passes, the chattel is destroyed. The loss falls on the seller who has sued at law for the price.[34] A. agrees to sell a house and lot. Before title passes, the house is destroyed. The seller sues in equity for specific performance. The loss falls upon the buyer.[35] That is probably the prevailing view, though its wisdom has been sharply criticized.[36] These variant conclusions are not dictated by variant considerations of policy or justice. They are projections of a principle to its logical outcome, or the outcome supposed to be logical. Equity treats that as done which ought to be done. Contracts for the sale of land, unlike most contracts for the sale of chattels, are within the jurisdiction of equity. The vendee is in equity the owner from the beginning. Therefore, the burdens as well as the benefits of ownership shall be his. Let me take as another illustration of my meaning the cases which define the rights of assignees of choses in action. In the discussion of these cases, you will find much conflict of opinion about fundamental conceptions. Some tell us that the assignee has a legal ownership.[37] Others say that his right is purely equitable.[38]

Given, however, the fundamental conception, all agree in deducing its consequences by methods in which the preponderating element is the method of philosophy. We may find kindred illustrations in the law of trusts and contracts and in many other fields. It would be wearisome to accumulate them.

The directive force of logic does not always exert itself, however, along a single and unobstructed path. One principle or precedent, pushed to the limit of its logic, may point to one conclusion; another principle or precedent, followed with like logic, may point with equal certainty to another. In this conflict, we must choose between the two paths, selecting one or other, or perhaps striking out upon a third, which will be the resultant of the two forces in combination, or will represent the mean between extremes. Let me take as an illustration of such conflict the famous case of Riggs v. Palmer, 115 N. Y. 506. That case decided that a legatee who had murdered his testator would not be permitted by a court of equity to enjoy the benefits of the will. Conflicting principles were there in competition for the mastery. One of them prevailed, and vanquished all the others. There was the principle of the binding force of a will disposing of the estate of a testator in conformity with law. That principle, pushed to the limit of its logic, seemed to uphold the title of the murderer. There was the principle that civil courts may not add to the pains and penalties of crimes. That, pushed to the limit of its logic, seemed again to uphold his title. But over against these was another principle, of greater generality, its roots deeply fastened in universal sentiments of justice, the principle that no man should profit from his own inequity or take advantage of his own wrong. The logic of this principle prevailed over the logic of the others. I say its logic prevailed. The thing which really interests us, however, is why and how the choice was made between one logic and another. In this instance, the reason is not obscure. One path was followed, another closed, because of the conviction in the judicial mind that the one selected led to justice. Analogies and precedents and the principles behind them were brought together as rivals for precedence; in the end, the principle that was thought to be most fundamental, to represent the larger and deeper social interests, put its competitors to flight. I am not greatly concerned about the particular formula through which justice was attained. Consistency was preserved, logic received its tribute, by holding that the legal title passed, but that it was subjected to a constructive trust.[39] A constructive trust is nothing but "the formula through which the conscience of equity finds expression."[40] Property is acquired in such circumstances that the holder of the legal title may not in good conscience retain the beneficial interest. Equity, to express its disapproval of his conduct, converts him into a trustee.[41] Such formulas are merely the remedial devices by which a result conceived of as right and just is made to square with principle and with the symmetry of the legal system. What concerns me now is not the remedial device, but rather the underlying motive, the indwelling, creative energy, which brings such devices into play. The murderer lost the legacy for which the murder was committed because the social interest served by refusing to permit the criminal to profit by his crime is greater than that served by the preservation and enforcement of legal rights of ownership. My illustration, indeed, has brought me ahead of my story. The judicial process is there in microcosm. We go forward with our logic, with our analogies, with our philosophies, till we reach a certain point. At first, we have no trouble with the paths; they follow the same lines. Then they begin to diverge, and we must make a choice between them. History or custom or social utility or some compelling sentiment of justice or sometimes perhaps a semi-intuitive apprehension of the pervading spirit of our law must come to the rescue of the anxious judge, and tell him where to go.

It is easy to accumulate examples of the process—of the constant checking and testing of philosophy by justice, and of justice by philosophy. Take the rule which permits recovery with compensation for defects in cases of substantial, though incomplete performance. We have often applied it for the protection of builders who in trifling details and without evil purpose have departed from their contracts. The courts had some trouble for a time, when they were deciding such cases, to square their justice with their logic. Even now, an uneasy feeling betrays itself in treatise and decision that the two fabrics do not fit. As I had occasion to say in a recent case: "Those who think more of symmetry and logic in the development of legal rules than of practical adaptation to the attainment of a just result" remain "troubled by a classification where the lines of division are so wavering and blurred."[42] I have no doubt that the inspiration of the rule is a mere sentiment of justice. That sentiment asserting itself, we have proceeded to surround it with the halo of conformity to precedent. Some judges saw the unifying principle in the law of quasi-contracts. Others saw it in the distinction between dependent and independent promises, or between promises and conditions. All found, however, in the end that there was a principle in the legal armory which, when taken down from the wall where it was rusting, was capable of furnishing a weapon for the fight and of hewing a path to justice. Justice reacted upon logic, sentiment upon reason, by guiding the choice to be made between one logic and another. Reason in its turn reacted upon sentiment by purging it of what is arbitrary, by checking it when it might otherwise have been extravagant, by relating it to method and order and coherence and tradition.[43]

In this conception of the method of logic or philosophy as one organon among several, I find nothing hostile to the teachings of continental jurists who would dethrone it from its place and power in systems of jurisprudence other than our own. They have combated an evil which has touched the common law only here and there, and lightly. I do not mean that there are not fields where we have stood in need of the same lesson. In some part, however, we have been saved by the inductive process through which our case law has developed from evils and dangers inseparable from the development of law, upon the basis of the jus scriptum, by a process of deduction.[44] Yet even continental jurists who emphasize the need of other methods, do not ask us to abstract from legal principles all their fructifying power. The misuse of logic or philosophy begins when its method and its ends are treated as supreme and final. They can never be banished altogether. "Assuredly," says François Gény,[45] "there should be no question of banishing ratiocination and logical methods from the science of positive law." Even general principles may sometimes be followed rigorously in the deduction of their consequences. "The abuse," he says, "consists, if I do not mistake, in envisaging ideal conceptions, provisional and purely subjective in their nature, as endowed with a permanent objective reality. And this false point of view, which, to my thinking, is a vestige of the absolute realism of the middle ages, ends in confining the entire system of positive law, a priori, within a limited number of logical categories, which are predetermined in essence, immovable in basis, governed by inflexible dogmas, and thus incapable of adapting themselves to the ever varied and changing exigencies of life."

[44] "Notre droit public, comme notre droit privé, est un jus scriptum" (Michoud, "La Responsibilité de l'état à raison des fautes de ses agents," Revue du droit public, 1895, p. 273, quoted by Gény, vol. I, p. 40, sec. 19).

[45] Op. cit., vol. I, p. 127, sec. 61.

In law, as in every other branch of knowledge, the truths given by induction tend to form the premises for new deductions. The lawyers and the judges of successive generations do not repeat for themselves the process of verification, any more than most of us repeat the demonstrations of the truths of astronomy or physics. A stock of juridical conceptions and formulas is developed, and we take them, so to speak, ready-made. Such fundamental conceptions as contract and possession and ownership and testament and many others are there, ready for use. How they came to be there, I do not need to inquire. I am writing, not a history of the evolution of law, but a sketch of the judicial process applied to law full grown. These fundamental conceptions once attained form the starting point from which are derived new consequences, which, at first tentative and groping, gain by reiteration a new permanence and certainty. In the end, they become accepted themselves as fundamental and axiomatic. So it is with the growth from precedent to precedent. The implications of a decision may in the beginning be equivocal. New cases by commentary and exposition extract the essence. At last there emerges a rule or principle which becomes a datum, a point of departure, from which new lines will be run, from which new courses will be measured. Sometimes the rule or principle is found to have been formulated too narrowly or too broadly, and has to be reframed.

Sometimes it is accepted as a postulate of later reasoning, its origins are forgotten, it becomes a new stock of descent, its issue unite with other strains, and persisting permeate the law. You may call the process one of analogy or of logic or of philosophy as you please. Its essence in any event is the derivation of a consequence from a rule or a principle or a precedent which, accepted as a datum, contains implicitly within itself the germ of the conclusion. In all this, I do not use the word philosophy in any strict or formal sense. The method tapers down from the syllogism at one end to mere analogy at the other. Sometimes the extension of a precedent goes to the limit of its logic. Sometimes it does not go so far. Sometimes by a process of analogy it is carried even farther. That is a tool which no system of jurisprudence has been able to discard.[46] A rule which has worked well in one field, or which, in any event, is there whether its workings have been revealed or not, is carried over into another. Instances of such a process I group under the same heading as those where the nexus of logic is closer and more binding.[47] At bottom and in their underlying motives, they are phases of the same method. They are inspired by the same yearning for consistency, for certainty, for uniformity of plan and structure. They have their roots in the constant striving of the mind for a larger and more inclusive unity, in which differences will be reconciled, and abnormalities will vanish.

LECTURE III.

TORTS. — TRESPASS AND NEGLIGENCE.

THE object of the next two Lectures is to discover whether there is any common ground at the bottom of all liability in tort, and if so, what that ground is. Supposing the attempt to succeed, it will reveal the general principle of civil liability at common law. The liabilities incurred by way of contract are more or less expressly fixed by the agreement of the parties concerned, but those arising from a tort are independent of any previous consent of the wrong-doer to bear the loss occasioned by his act. If A fails to pay a certain sum on a certain day, or to deliver a lecture on a certain night, after having made a binding promise to do so, the damages which he has to pay are recovered in accordance with his consent that some or all of the harms which may be caused by his failure shall fall upon him. But when A assaults or slanders his neighbor, or converts his neighbor's property, he does a harm which he has never consented to bear, and if the law makes him pay for it, the reason for doing so must be found in some general view of the conduct which every one may fairly expect and demand from every other, whether that other has agreed to it or not.

Such a general view is very hard to find. The law did not begin with a theory. It has never worked one out. The point from which it started and that at which I shall try to show that it has arrived, are on different planes. In the progress from one to the other, it is to be expected that its course should not be straight and its direction not always visible. All that can be done is to point out a tendency, and to justify it. The tendency, which is our main concern, is a matter of fact to be gathered from the cases. But the difficulty of showing it is much enhanced by the circumstance that, until lately, the substantive law has been approached only through the categories of the forms of action. Discussions of legislative principle have been darkened by arguments on the limits between trespass and case, or on the scope of a general issue. In place of a theory of tort, we have a theory of trespass. And even within that narrower limit, precedents of the time of the assize and jurata have been applied without a thought of their connection with a long forgotten procedure.

Since the ancient forms of action have disappeared, a broader treatment of the subject ought to be possible. Ignorance is the best of law reformers. People are glad to discuss a question on general principles, when they have forgotten the special knowledge necessary for technical reasoning. But the present willingness to generalize is founded on more than merely negative grounds. The philosophical habit of the day, the frequency of legislation, and the ease with which the law may be changed to meet the opinions and wishes of the public, all make it natural and unavoidable that judges as well as others should openly discuss the legislative principles upon which their decisions must always rest in the end, and should base their judgments upon broad considerations of policy to which the traditions of the bench would hardly have tolerated a reference fifty years ago.

The business of the law of torts is to fix the dividing lines between those cases in which a man is liable for harm which he has done, and those in which he is not. But it cannot enable him to predict with certainty whether a given act under given circumstances will make him liable, because an act will rarely have that effect unless followed by damage, and for the most part, if not always, the consequences of an act are not known, but only guessed at as more or less probable. All the rules that the law can lay down beforehand are rules for determining the conduct which will be followed by liability if it is followed by harm, — that is, the conduct which a man pursues at his peril. The only guide for the future to be drawn from a decision against a defendant in an action of tort is that similar acts, under circumstances which cannot be distinguished except by the result from those of the defendant, are done at the peril of the actor; that if he escapes liability, it is simply because by good fortune no harm comes of his conduct in the particular event.

If, therefore, there is any common ground for all liability in tort, we shall best find it by eliminating the event as it actually turns out, and by considering only the principles on which the peril of his conduct is thrown upon the actor. We are to ask what are the elements, on the defendant's side, which must all be present before liability is possible, and the presence of which will commonly make him liable if damage follows.

The law of torts abounds in moral phraseology. It has much to say of wrongs, of malice, fraud, intent, and negligence. Hence it may naturally be supposed that the risk of a man's conduct is thrown upon him as the result of some moral short-coming. But while this notion has been entertained, the extreme opposite will be found to have been a far more popular opinion;—I mean the notion that a man is answerable for all the consequences of his acts, or, in other words, that he acts at his peril always, and wholly irrespective of the state of his consciousness upon the matter.

To test the former opinion it would be natural to take up successively the several words, such as negligence and intent, which in the language of morals designate various well-understood states of mind, and to show their significance in the law. To test the latter, it would perhaps be more convenient to consider it under the head of the several forms of action. So many of our authorities are decisions under one or another of these forms, that it will not be safe to neglect them, at least in the first instance; and a compromise between the two modes of approaching the subject may be reached by beginning with the action of trespass and the notion of negligence together, leaving wrongs which are defined as intentional for the next Lecture.

Trespass lies for unintentional, as well as for intended wrongs. Any wrongful and direct application of force is redressed by that action. It therefore affords a fair field for a discussion of the general principles of liability for unintentional wrongs at common law. For it can hardly be supposed that a man's responsibility for the consequences of his acts varies as the remedy happens to fall on one side or the other of the penumbra which separates trespass from the action on the case. And the greater part of the law of torts will be found under one or the other of those two heads.

It might be hastily assumed that the action on the case is founded on the defendant's negligence. But if that be so, the same doctrine must prevail in trespass. It might be assumed that trespass is founded on the defendant's having caused damage by his act, without regard to negligence. But if that be true, the law must apply the same criterion to other wrongs differing from trespass only in some technical point; as, for instance, that the property damaged was in the defendant's possession. Neither of the above assumptions, however, can be hastily permitted. It might very well be argued that the action on the case adopts the severe rule just suggested for trespass, except when the action is founded on a contract. Negligence, it might be said, had nothing to do with the common-law liability for a nuisance, and it might be added that, where negligence was a ground of liability, a special duty had to be founded in the defendant's super se assumpsit, or public calling.[1] On the other hand, we shall see what can be said for the proposition, that even in trespass there must at least be negligence. But whichever argument prevails for the one form of action must prevail for the other. The discussion may therefore be shortened on its technical side, by confining it to trespass so far as may be practicable without excluding light to be got from other parts of the law.

As has just been hinted, there are two theories of the common-law liability for unintentional harm. Both of them seem to receive the implied assent of popular text-books, and neither of them is wanting in plausibility and the semblance of authority.

The first is that of Austin, which is essentially the theory of a criminalist. According to him, the characteristic feature of law, properly so called, is a sanction or detriment threatened and imposed by the sovereign for disobedience to the sovereign's commands. As the greater part of the law only makes a man civilly answerable for breaking it, Austin is compelled to regard the liability to an action as a sanction, or, in other words, as a penalty for disobedience. It follows from this, according to the prevailing views of penal law, that such liability ought only to be based upon personal fault; and Austin accepts that conclusion, with its corollaries, one of which is that negligence means a state of the party's mind.[1] These doctrines will be referred to later, so far as necessary.

[1] See Lecture VII.

The other theory is directly opposed to the foregoing. It seems to be adopted by some of the greatest common-law authorities, and requires serious discussion before it can be set aside in favor of any third opinion which may be maintained. According to this view, broadly stated, under the common law a man acts at his peril. It may be held as a sort of set-off, that he is never liable for omissions except in consequence of some duty voluntarily undertaken. But the whole and sufficient ground for such liabilities as he does incur outside the last class is supposed to be that he has voluntarily acted, and that damage has ensued. If the act was voluntary, it is totally immaterial that the detriment which followed from it was neither intended nor due to the negligence of the actor.

In order to do justice to this way of looking at the subject, we must remember that the abolition of the common-law forms of pleading has not changed the rules of substantive law. Hence, although pleaders now generally allege intent or negligence, anything which would formerly have been sufficient to charge a defendant in trespass is still sufficient, notwithstanding the fact that the ancient form of action and declaration has disappeared.

In the first place, it is said, consider generally the protection given by the law to property, both within and outside the limits of the last-named action. If a man crosses his neighbor's boundary by however innocent a mistake, or if his cattle escape into his neighbor's field, he is said to be liable in trespass quare clausum fregit. If an auctioneer in the most perfect good faith, and in the regular course of his business, sells goods sent to his rooms for the purpose of being sold, he may be compelled to pay their full value if a third person turns out to be the owner, although he has paid over the proceeds, and has no means of obtaining indemnity.

Now suppose that, instead of a dealing with the plaintiff's property, the case is that force has proceeded directly from the defendant's body to the plaintiff's body, it is urged that, as the law cannot be less careful of the persons than of the property of its subjects, the only defences possible are similar to those which would have been open to an alleged trespass on land. You may show that there was no trespass by showing that the defendant did no act; as where he was thrown from his horse upon the plaintiff, or where a third person took his hand and struck the plaintiff with it. In such cases the defendant's body is the passive instrument of an external force, and the bodily motion relied on by the plaintiff is not his act at all. So you may show a justification or excuse in the conduct of the plaintiff himself. But if no such excuse is shown, and the defendant has voluntarily acted, he must answer for the consequences, however little intended and however unforeseen. If, for instance, being assaulted by a third person, the defendant lifted his stick and accidentally hit the plaintiff, who was standing behind him, according to this view he is liable, irrespective of any negligence toward the party injured.

The arguments for the doctrine under consideration are, for the most part, drawn from precedent, but it is sometimes supposed to be defensible as theoretically sound. Every man, it is said, has an absolute right to his person, and so forth, free from detriment at the hands of his neighbors. In the cases put, the plaintiff has done nothing; the defendant, on the other hand, has chosen to act. As between the two, the party whose voluntary conduct has caused the damage should suffer, rather than one who has had no share in producing it.

We have more difficult matter to deal with when we turn to the pleadings and precedents in trespass. The declaration says nothing of negligence, and it is clear that the damage need not have been intended. The words vi et armis and contra pacem, which might seem to imply intent, are supposed to have been inserted merely to give jurisdiction to the king's court. Glanvill says it belongs to the sheriff, in case of neglect on the part of lords of franchise, to take cognizance of mêlées, blows, and even wounds, unless the accuser add a charge of breach of the king's peace (nisi accusator adjiciat de pace Domini Regis infracta).[1] Reeves observes, "In this distinction between the sheriff's jurisdiction and that of the king, we see the reason of the allegation in modern indictments and writs, vi et armis, of 'the king's crown and dignity,' 'the king's peace,' and 'the peace,' — this last expression being sufficient, after the peace of the sheriff had ceased to be distinguished as a separate jurisdiction." [1]

Again, it might be said that, if the defendant's intent or neglect was essential to his liability, the absence of both would deprive his act of the character of a trespass, and ought therefore to be admissible under the general issue. But it is perfectly well settled at common law that "Not guilty" only denies the act.[2]

Next comes the argument from authority. I will begin with an early and important case.[3] It was trespass quare clausum. The defendant pleaded that he owned adjoining land, upon which was a thorn hedge; that he cut the thorns, and that they, against his will (ipso invito), fell on the plaintiff's land, and the defendant went quickly upon the same, and took them, which was the trespass complained of. And on demurrer judgment was given for the plaintiff. The plaintiff's counsel put cases which have been often repeated. One of them, Fairfax, said: "There is a diversity between an act resulting in a felony, and one resulting in a trespass. . . . If one is cutting trees, and the boughs fall on a man and wound him, in this case he shall have an action of trespass, &c., and also, sir, if one is shooting at butts, and his bow shakes in his hands, and kills a man, ipso invito, it is no felony, as has been said,

[1] Hist. English Law, I. 113 (bis), n. a; Id., ed. Finlason, I. 178, n. 1. Fitzherbert (N. B. 85, F.) says that in the vicontiel writ of trespass, which is not returnable into the king's court, it shall not be said quare vi et armis. Cf. Ib. 86, H.

&c.; but if he wounds one by shooting, he shall have a good action of trespass against him, and yet the shooting was lawful, &c., and the wrong which the other receives was against his will, &c.; and so here, &c." Brian, another counsel, states the whole doctrine, and uses equally familiar illustrations. "When one does a thing, he is bound to do it in such a way that by his act no prejudice or damage shall be done to &c. As if I am building a house, and when the timber is being put up a piece of timber falls on my neighbor's house and breaks his house, he shall have a good action, &c.; and yet the raising of the house was lawful, and the timber fell, me invito, &c. And so if one assaults me and I cannot escape, and I in self-defence lift my stick to strike him, and in lifting it hit a man who is behind me, in this case he shall have an action against me, yet my raising my stick was lawful in self-defence, and I hit him, me invito, &c.; and so here, &c."

"Littleton, J. to the same intent, and if a man is damaged he ought to be recompensed. . . . If your cattle come on my land and eat my grass, notwithstanding you come freshly and drive them out, you ought to make amends for what your cattle have done, be it more or less. . . . And, sir, if this should be law that he might enter and take the thorns, for the same reason, if he cut a large tree, he might come with his wagons and horses to carry the trees off, which is not reason, for perhaps he has corn or other crops growing, &c., and no more here, for the law is all one in great things and small. . . . Choke, C. J. to the same intent, for when the principal thing was not lawful, that which depends upon it was not lawful; for when he cut the thorns and they fell on my land, this falling was not lawful, and therefore his coming to take them out was not lawful. As to what was said about their falling in ipso invito, that is no plea, but he ought to show that he could not do it in any other way, or that he did all that was in his power to keep them out."

Forty years later,[1] the Year Books report Rede, J. as adopting the argument of Fairfax in the last case. In trespass, he says, "the intent cannot be construed; but in felony it shall be. As when a man shoots at butts and kills a man, it is not felony et il sei̇ come n'avoit l'entent de luy tuer; and so of a tiler on a house who with a stone kills a man unwittingly, it is not felony.[2] But when a man shoots at the butts and wounds a man, though it is against his will, he shall be called a trespasser against his intent."

There is a series of later shooting cases, Weaver v. Ward,[3] Dickenson v. Watson,[4] and Underwood v. Hewson,[5] followed by the Court of Appeals of New York in Castle v. Duryee,[6] in which defences to the effect that the damage was done accidentally and by misfortune, and against the will of the defendant, were held insufficient.

In the reign of Queen Elizabeth it was held that where a man with a gun at the door of his house shot at a fowl, and thereby set fire to his own house and to the house of his neighbor, he was liable in an action on the case generally, the declaration not being on the custom of the realm,

"viz. for negligently keeping his fire." "For the injury is the same, although this mischance was not by a common negligence, but by misadventure." [1]

The above-mentioned instances of the stick and shooting at butts became standard illustrations; they are repeated by Sir Thomas Raymond, in Bessey v. Olliot,[2] by Sir William Blackstone, in the famous squib case,[3] and by other judges, and have become familiar through the text-books. Sir T. Raymond, in the above case, also repeats the thought and almost the words of Littleton, J., which have been quoted, and says further: "In all civil acts the law doth not so much regard the intent of the actor, as the loss and damage of the party suffering." Sir William Blackstone also adopts a phrase from Dickenson v. Watson, just cited: "Nothing but inevitable necessity" is a justification. So Lord Ellenborough, in Leame v. Bray: [4] "If the injury were received from the personal act of another, it was deemed sufficient to make it trespass"; or, according to the more frequently quoted language of Grose, J., in the same case: "Looking into all the cases from the Year Book in the 21 H. VII. down to the latest decision on the subject, I find the principle to be, that if the injury be done by the act of the party himself at the time, or he be the immediate cause of it, though it happen accidentally or by misfortune, yet he is answerable in trespass." Further citations are deemed unnecessary.

In spite, however, of all the arguments which may be urged for the rule that a man acts at his peril, it has been rejected by very eminent courts, even under the old forms of action. In view of this fact, and of the further circumstance that, since the old forms have been abolished, the allegation of negligence has spread from the action on the case to all ordinary declarations in tort which do not allege intent, probably many lawyers would be surprised that any one should think it worth while to go into the present discussion. Such is the natural impression to be derived from daily practice. But even if the doctrine under consideration had no longer any followers, which is not the case, it would be well to have something more than daily practice to sustain our views upon so fundamental a question; as it seems to me at least, the true principle is far from being articulately grasped by all who are interested in it, and can only be arrived at after a careful analysis of what has been thought hitherto. It might be thought enough to cite the decisions opposed to the rule of absolute responsibility, and to show that such a rule is inconsistent with admitted doctrines and sound policy. But we may go further with profit, and inquire whether there are not strong grounds for thinking that the common law has never known such a rule, unless in that period of dry precedent which is so often to be found midway between a creative epoch and a period of solvent philosophical reaction. Conciliating the attention of those who, contrary to most modern practitioners, still adhere to the strict doctrine, by reminding them once more that there are weighty decisions to be cited adverse to it, and that, if they have involved an innovation, the fact that it has been made by such magistrates as Chief Justice Shaw goes far to prove that the change was politic, I think I may assert that a little reflection will show that it was required not only by policy, but by consistency. I will begin with the latter.

The same reasoning which would make a man answerable in trespass for all damage to another by force directly resulting from his own act, irrespective of negligence or intent, would make him answerable in case for the like damage similarly resulting from the act of his servant, in the course of the latter's employment. The discussions of the company's negligence in many railway cases[1] would therefore be wholly out of place, for although, to be sure, there is a contract which would make the company liable for negligence, that contract cannot be taken to diminish any liability which would otherwise exist for a trespass on the part of its employees.

More than this, the same reasoning would make a defendant responsible for all damage, however remote, of which his act could be called the cause. So long, at least, as only physical or irresponsible agencies, however unforeseen, co-operated with the act complained of to produce the result, the argument which would resolve the case of accidentally striking the plaintiff, when lifting a stick in necessary self-defence, adversely to the defendant, would require a decision against him in every case where his act was a factor in the result complained of. The distinction between a direct application of force, and causing damage indirectly, or as a more remote consequence of one's act, although it may determine whether the form of action should be trespass or case, does not touch the theory of responsibility, if that theory be that a man acts at his peril.

[1] Ex. gr. Metropolitan Railway Co. v. Jackson, 3 App. Cas. 193. See M'Manus v. Crickett, 1 East, 106, 108.

As was said at the outset, if the strict liability is to be maintained at all, it must be maintained throughout. A principle cannot be stated which would retain the strict liability in trespass while abandoning it in case. It cannot be said that trespass is for acts alone, and case for consequences of those acts. All actions of trespass are for consequences of acts, not for the acts themselves. And some actions of trespass are for consequences more remote from the defendant's act than in other instances where the remedy would be case.

An act is always a voluntary muscular contraction, and nothing else. The chain of physical sequences which it sets in motion or directs to the plaintiff's harm is no part of it, and very generally a long train of such sequences intervenes. An example or two will make this extremely clear.

When a man commits an assault and battery with a pistol, his only act is to contract the muscles of his arm and forefinger in a certain way, but it is the delight of elementary writers to point out what a vast series of physical changes must take place before the harm is done. Suppose that, instead of firing a pistol, he takes up a hose which is discharging water on the sidewalk, and directs it at the plaintiff, he does not even set in motion the physical causes which must co-operate with his act to make a battery. Not only natural causes, but a living being, may intervene between the act and its effect. Gibbons v. Pepper,[1] which decided that there was no battery when a man's horse was frightened by accident or a third person and ran away with him, and ran over the plaintiff, takes the distinction that, if the rider by spurring is the cause of the accident, then he is guilty. In Scott v. Shepherd,[1] already mentioned, trespass was maintained against one who had thrown a squib into a crowd, where it was tossed from hand to hand in self-defence until it burst and injured the plaintiff. Here even human agencies were a part of the chain between the defendant's act and the result, although they were treated as more or less nearly automatic, in order to arrive at the decision.

Now I repeat, that, if principle requires us to charge a man in trespass when his act has brought force to bear on another through a comparatively short train of intervening causes, in spite of his having used all possible care, it requires the same liability, however numerous and unexpected the events between the act and the result. If running a man down is a trespass when the accident can be referred to the rider's act of spurring, why is it not a tort in every case, as was argued in Vincent v. Stinehour,[2] seeing that it can always be referred more remotely to his act of mounting and taking the horse out?

Why is a man not responsible for the consequences of an act innocent in its direct and obvious effects, when those consequences would not have followed but for the intervention of a series of extraordinary, although natural, events? The reason is, that, if the intervening events are of such a kind that no foresight could have been expected to look out for them, the defendant is not to blame for having failed to do so. It seems to be admitted by the English judges that, even on the question whether the acts of leaving dry trimmings in hot weather by the side of a railroad, and then sending an engine over the track, are negligent, — that is, are a ground of liability, — the consequences which might reasonably be anticipated are material.[1] Yet these are acts which, under the circumstances, can hardly be called innocent in their natural and obvious effects. The same doctrine has been applied to acts in violation of statute which could not reasonably have been expected to lead to the result complained of.[2]

[1] 2 Wm. Bl. 892. Cf. Clark v. Chambers, 3 Q. B. D. 327, 330, 338.

But there is no difference in principle between the case where a natural cause or physical factor intervenes after the act in some way not to be foreseen, and turns what seemed innocent to harm, and the case where such a cause or factor intervenes, unknown, at the time; as, for the matter of that, it did in the English cases cited. If a man is excused in the one case because he is not to blame, he must be in the other. The difference taken in Gibbons v. Pepper, cited above, is not between results which are and those which are not the consequences of the defendant's acts: it is between consequences which he was bound as a reasonable man to contemplate, and those which he was not. Hard spurring is just so much more likely to lead to harm than merely riding a horse in the street, that the court thought that the defendant would be bound to look out for the consequences of the one, while it would not hold him liable for those resulting merely from the other;

But it is desired to lay down no proposition which admits of controversy, and it is enough for the present purposes that Si homo fait un loyal act, que apres devint illoyal, ceo est damnum sine injuria. because the possibility of being run away with when riding quietly, though familiar, is comparatively slight. If, however, the horse had been unruly, and had been taken into a frequented place for the purpose of being broken, the owner might have been liable, because "it was his fault to bring a wild horse into a place where mischief might probably be done."[1]

To return to the example of the accidental blow with a stick lifted in self-defence, there is no difference between hitting a person standing in one's rear and hitting one who was pushed by a horse within range of the stick just as it was lifted, provided that it was not possible, under the circumstances, in the one case to have known, in the other to have anticipated, the proximity. In either case there is wanting the only element which distinguishes voluntary acts from spasmodic muscular contractions as a ground of liability. In neither of them, that is to say, has there been an opportunity of choice with reference to the consequence complained of, — a chance to guard against the result which has come to pass. A choice which entails a concealed consequence is as to that consequence no choice.

The general principle of our law is that loss from accident must lie where it falls, and this principle is not affected by the fact that a human being is the instrument of misfortune. But relatively to a given human being anything is accident which he could not fairly have been expected to contemplate as possible, and therefore to avoid. In the language of the late Chief Justice Nelson of New York: "No case or principle can be found, or if found can be maintained, subjecting an individual to liability for an act done without fault on his part. . . . All the cases concede that an injury arising from inevitable accident, or, which in law or reason is the same thing, from an act that ordinary human care and foresight are unable to guard against, is but the misfortune of the sufferer, and lays no foundation for legal responsibility."[1] If this were not so, any act would be sufficient, however remote, which set in motion or opened the door for a series of physical sequences ending in damage; such as riding the horse, in the case of the runaway, or even coming to a place where one is seized with a fit and strikes the plaintiff in an unconscious spasm. Nay, why need the defendant have acted at all, and why is it not enough that his existence has been at the expense of the plaintiff? The requirement of an act is the requirement that the defendant should have made a choice. But the only possible purpose of introducing this moral element is to make the power of avoiding the evil complained of a condition of liability. There is no such power where the evil cannot be foreseen.[2] Here we reach the argument from policy, and I shall accordingly postpone for a moment the discussion of trespasses upon land, and of conversions, and will take up the liability for cattle separately at a later stage.

A man need not, it is true, do this or that act, — the term act implies a choice, — but he must act somehow. Furthermore, the public generally profits by individual activity. As action cannot be avoided, and tends to the public good, there is obviously no policy in throwing the hazard of what is at once desirable and inevitable upon the actor.

The state might conceivably make itself a mutual insurance company against accidents, and distribute the burden of its citizens' mishaps among all its members. There might be a pension for paralytics, and state aid for those who suffered in person or estate from tempest or wild beasts. As between individuals it might adopt the mutual insurance principle pro tanto, and divide damages when both were in fault, as in the rusticum judicium of the admiralty, or it might throw all loss upon the actor irrespective of fault. The state does none of these things, however, and the prevailing view is that its cumbrous and expensive machinery ought not to be set in motion unless some clear benefit is to be derived from disturbing the status quo. State interference is an evil, where it cannot be shown to be a good. Universal insurance, if desired, can be better and more cheaply accomplished by private enterprise. The undertaking to redistribute losses simply on the ground that they resulted from the defendant's act would not only be open to these objections, but, as it is hoped the preceding discussion has shown, to the still graver one of offending the sense of justice. Unless my act is of a nature to threaten others, unless under the circumstances a prudent man would have foreseen the possibility of harm, it is no more justifiable to make me indemnify my neighbor against the consequences, than to make me do the same thing if I had fallen upon him in a fit, or to compel me to insure him against lightning.

I must now recur to the conclusions drawn from innocent trespasses upon land, and conversions, and the supposed analogy of those cases to trespasses against the person, lest the law concerning the latter should be supposed to lie between two antinomies, each necessitating with equal cogency an opposite conclusion to the other.

Take first the case of trespass upon land attended by actual damage. When a man goes upon his neighbor's land, thinking it is his own, he intends the very act or consequence complained of. He means to intermeddle with a certain thing in a certain way, and it is just that intended intermeddling for which he is sued.[1] Whereas, if he accidentally hits a stranger as he lifts his staff in self-defence, the fact, which is the gist of the action, — namely, the contact between the staff and his neighbor's head, — was not intended, and could not have been foreseen. It might be answered, to be sure, that it is not for intermeddling with property, but for intermeddling with the plaintiff's property, that a man is sued; and that in the supposed cases, just as much as in that of the accidental blow, the defendant is ignorant of one of the facts making up the total environment, and which must be present to make his action wrong. He is ignorant, that is to say, that the true owner either has or claims any interest in the property in question, and therefore he does not intend a wrongful act, because he does not mean to deal with his neighbor's property. But the answer to this is, that he does intend to do the damage complained of. One who diminishes the value of property by intentional damage knows it belongs to somebody. If he thinks it belongs to himself, he expects whatever harm he may do to come out of his own pocket. It would be odd if he were to get rid of the burden by discovering that it belonged to his neighbor. It is a very different thing to say that he who intentionally does harm must bear the loss, from saying that one from whose acts harm follows accidentally, as a consequence which could not have been foreseen, must bear it.

[1] Cf. Hobart v. Hagget, 3 Fairf. (Me.) 67.

Next, suppose the act complained of is an exercise of dominion over the plaintiff's property, such as a merely technical trespass or a conversion. If the defendant thought that the property belonged to himself, there seems to be no abstract injustice in requiring him to know the limits of his own titles, or, if he thought that it belonged to another, in holding him bound to get proof of title before acting. Consider, too, what the defendant's liability amounts to, if the act, whether an entry upon land or a conversion of chattels, has been unattended by damage to the property, and the thing has come back to the hands of the true owner. The sum recovered is merely nominal, and the payment is nothing more than a formal acknowledgment of the owner's title; which, considering the effect of prescription and statutes of limitation upon repeated acts of dominion, is no more than right.[1] All semblance of injustice disappears when the defendant is allowed to avoid the costs of an action by tender or otherwise.

But suppose the property has not come back to the hands of the true owner. If the thing remains in the hands of the defendant, it is clearly right that he should surrender it. And if instead of the thing itself he holds the proceeds of a sale, it is as reasonable to make him pay over its value in trover or assumpsit as it would have been to compel a surrender of the thing. But the question whether the defendant has subsequently paid over the proceeds of the sale of a chattel to a third person, cannot affect the rights of the true owner of the chattel. In the supposed case of an auctioneer, for instance, if he had paid the true owner, it would have been an answer to his bailor's claim. If he has paid his bailor instead, he has paid one whom he was not bound to pay, and no general principle requires that this should be held to divest the plaintiff's right.

Another consideration affecting the argument that the law as to trespasses upon property establishes a general principle, is that the defendant's knowledge or ignorance of the plaintiff's title is likely to lie wholly in his own breast, and therefore hardly admits of satisfactory proof. Indeed, in many cases it cannot have been open to evidence at all at the time when the law was settled, before parties were permitted to testify. Accordingly, in Basely v. Clarkson,[1] where the defence set up to an action of trespass quare clausum was that the defendant in mowing his own land involuntarily and by mistake mowed down some of the plaintiff's grass, the plaintiff had judgment on demurrer. "For it appears the fact was voluntary, and his intention and knowledge are not traversable; they can't be known."

This language suggests that it would be sufficient to explain the law of trespass upon property historically, without attempting to justify it. For it seems to be admitted that if the defendant's mistake could be proved it might be material.[2] It will be noticed, further, that any general argument from the law of trespass upon land to that governing trespass against the person is shown to be misleading by the law as to cattle. The owner is bound at his peril to keep them off his neighbor's premises, but he is not bound at his peril in all cases to keep them from his neighbor's person.

The objections to such a decision as supposed in the case of an auctioneer do not rest on the general theory of liability, but spring altogether from the special exigencies of commerce. It does not become unjust to hold a person liable for unauthorized intermeddling with another's property, until there arises the practical necessity for rapid dealing. But where this practical necessity exists, it is not surprising to find, and we do find, a different tendency in the law. The absolute protection of property, however natural to a primitive community more occupied in production than in exchange, is hardly consistent with the requirements of modern business. Even when the rules which we have been considering were established, the traffic of the public markets was governed by more liberal principles. On the continent of Europe it was long ago decided that the policy of protecting titles must yield to the policy of protecting trade. Casaregis held that the general principle nemo plus juris in alium transferre potest quam ipse habet must give way in mercantile transactions to possession vaut titre.[1] In later times, as markets overt have lost their importance, the Factors' Acts and their successive amendments have tended more and more in the direction of adopting the Continental doctrine.

I must preface the argument from precedent with a reference to what has been said already in the first Lecture about early forms of liability, and especially about the appeals. It was there shown that the appeals de pace et plagis and of mayhem became the action of trespass, and that those appeals and the early actions of trespass were always, so far as appears, for intentional wrongs.[1]

The contra pacem in the writ of trespass was no doubt inserted to lay a foundation for the king's writ; but there seems to be no reason to attribute a similar purpose to vi et armis, or cum vi sua, as it was often put. Glanvill says that wounds are within the sheriff's jurisdiction, unless the appellor adds a charge of breach of the king's peace.[2] Yet the wounds are given vi et armis as much in the one case as in the other. Bracton says that the lesser wrongs described by him belong to the king's jurisdiction, "because they are sometimes against the peace of our lord the king,"[3] while, as has been observed, they were supposed to be always committed intentionally. It might even perhaps be inferred that the allegation contra pacem was originally material, and it will be remembered that trespasses formerly involved the liability to pay a fine to the king.[4]

If it be true that trespass was originally confined to intentional wrongs, it is hardly necessary to consider the argument drawn from the scope of the general issue. In form it was a mitigation of the strict denial de verbo in verbum of the ancient procedure, to which the inquest given by the king's writ was unknown.[5] The strict form seems to have lasted in England some time after the trial of the issue by recognition was introduced.[6] When a recognition was granted, the inquest was, of course, only competent to speak to the facts, as has been said above.[1] When the general issue was introduced, trespass was still confined to intentional wrongs.

We may now take up the authorities. It will be remembered that the earlier precedents are of a date when the assize and jurata had not given place to the modern jury. These bodies spoke from their own knowledge to an issue defined by the writ, or to certain familiar questions of fact arising in the trial of a cause, but did not hear the whole case upon evidence adduced. Their function was more limited than that which has been gained by the jury, and it naturally happened that, when they had declared what the defendant had done, the judges laid down the standard by which those acts were to be measured without their assistance. Hence the question in the Year Books is not a loose or general inquiry of the jury whether they think the alleged trespasser was negligent on such facts as they may find, but a well-defined issue of law, to be determined by the court, whether certain acts set forth upon the record are a ground of liability. It is possible that the judges may have dealt pretty strictly with defendants, and it is quite easy to pass from the premise that defendants have been held trespassers for a variety of acts, without mention of neglect, to the conclusion that any act by which another was damaged will make the actor chargeable. But a more exact scrutiny of the early books will show that liability in general, then as later, was founded on the opinion of the tribunal that the defendant ought to have acted otherwise, or, in other words, that he was to blame.

Returning first to the case of the thorns in the Year Book,[1] it will be seen that the falling of the thorns into the plaintiff's close, although a result not wished by the defendant, was in no other sense against his will. When he cut the thorns, he did an act which obviously and necessarily would have that consequence, and he must be taken to have foreseen and not to have prevented it. Choke, C. J. says, "As to what was said about their falling in, ipso invito, that is no plea, but he ought to show that he could not do it in any other way, or that he did all in his power to keep them out"; and both the judges put the unlawfulness of the entry upon the plaintiff's land as a consequence of the unlawfulness of dropping the thorns there. Choke admits that, if the thorns or a tree had been blown over upon the plaintiff's land, the defendant might have entered to get them. Chief Justice Crew says of this case, in Millen v. Fawdry,[2] that the opinion was that "trespass lies, because he did not plead that he did his best endeavor to hinder their falling there; yet this was a hard case." The statements of law by counsel in argument may be left on one side, although Brian is quoted and mistaken for one of the judges by Sir William Blackstone, in Scott v. Shepherd.

The principal authorities are the shooting cases, and, as shooting is an extra-hazardous act, it would not be surprising if it should be held that men do it at their peril in public places. The liability has been put on the general ground of fault, however, wherever the line of necessary precaution may be drawn. In Weaver v. Ward,[1] the defendant set up that the plaintiff and he were skirmishing in a trainband, and that when discharging his piece he wounded the plaintiff by accident and misfortune, and against his own will. On demurrer, the court says that "no man shall be excused of a trespass, . . . except it may be judged utterly without his fault. As if a man by force take my hand and strike you, or if here the defendant had said, that the plaintiff ran cross his piece when it was discharging, or had set forth the case with the circumstances so as it had appeared to the court that it had been inevitable, and that the defendant had committed no negligence to give occasion to the hurt." The later cases simply follow Weaver v. Ward.

The quotations which were made above in favor of the strict doctrine from Sir T. Raymond, in Bessey v. Olliot, and from Sir William Blackstone, in Scott v. Shepherd, are both taken from dissenting opinions. In the latter case it is pretty clear that the majority of the court considered that to repel personal danger by instantaneously tossing away a squib thrown by another upon one's stall was not a trespass, although a new motion was thereby imparted to the squib, and the plaintiff's eye was put out in consequence. The last case cited above, in stating the arguments for absolute responsibility, was Leame v. Bray.[2] The question under discussion was whether the action (for running down the plaintiff) should not have been case rather than trespass, the defendant founding his objection to trespass on the ground that the injury happened through his neglect, but was not done wilfully. There was therefore no question of absolute responsibility for one's acts before the court, as negligence was admitted; and the language used is all directed simply to the proposition that the damage need not have been done intentionally.

In Wakeman v. Robinson,[1] another runaway case, there was evidence that the defendant pulled the wrong rein, and that he ought to have kept a straight course. The jury were instructed that, if the injury was occasioned by an immediate act of the defendant, it was immaterial whether the act was wilful or accidental. On motion for a new trial, Dallas, C. J. said, "If the accident happened entirely without default on the part of the defendant, or blame imputable to him, the action does not lie. . . . The accident was clearly occasioned by the default of the defendant. The weight of evidence was all that way. I am now called upon to grant a new trial, contrary to the justice of the case, upon the ground, that the jury were not called on to consider whether the accident was unavoidable, or occasioned by the fault of the defendant. There can be no doubt that the learned judge who presided would have taken the opinion of the jury on that ground, if he had been requested so to do." This language may have been inapposite under the defendant's plea (the general issue), but the pleadings were not adverted to, and the doctrine is believed to be sound.

In America there have been several decisions to the point. In Brown v. Kendall,[2] Chief Justice Shaw settled the question for Massachusetts. That was trespass for assault and battery, and it appeared that the defendant, while trying to separate two fighting dogs, had raised his stick over his shoulder in the act of striking, and had accidentally hit the plaintiff in the eye, inflicting upon him a severe injury. The case was stronger for the plaintiff than if the defendant had been acting in self-defence; but the court held that, although the defendant was bound by no duty to separate the dogs, yet, if he was doing a lawful act, he was not liable unless he was wanting in the care which men of ordinary prudence would use under the circumstances, and that the burden was on the plaintiff to prove the want of such care.

In such a matter no authority is more deserving of respect than that of Chief Justice Shaw, for the strength of that great judge lay in an accurate appreciation of the requirements of the community whose officer he was. Some, indeed many, English judges could be named who have surpassed him in accurate technical knowledge, but few have lived who were his equals in their understanding of the grounds of public policy to which all laws must ultimately be referred. It was this which made him, in the language of the late Judge Curtis, the greatest magistrate which this country has produced.

Brown v. Kendall has been followed in Connecticut,[1] in a case where a man fired a pistol, in lawful self-defence as he alleged, and hit a bystander. The court was strongly of opinion that the defendant was not answerable on the general principles of trespass, unless there was a failure to use such care as was practicable under the circumstances. The foundation of liability in trespass as well as case was said to be negligence. The Supreme Court of the United States has given the sanction of its approval to the same doctrine.[2] The language of Harvey v. Dunlop[3] has been quoted, and there is a case in Vermont which tends in the same direction.[1]

Supposing it now to be conceded that the general notion upon which liability to an action is founded is fault or blameworthiness in some sense, the question arises, whether it is so in the sense of personal moral shortcoming, as would practically result from Austin's teaching. The language of Rede, J., which has been quoted from the Year Book, gives a sufficient answer. "In trespass the intent" (we may say more broadly, the defendant's state of mind) "cannot be construed." Suppose that a defendant were allowed to testify that, before acting, he considered carefully what would be the conduct of a prudent man under the circumstances, and, having formed the best judgment he could, acted accordingly. If the story was believed, it would be conclusive against the defendant's negligence judged by a moral standard which would take his personal characteristics into account. But supposing any such evidence to have got before the jury, it is very clear that the court would say, Gentlemen, the question is not whether the defendant thought his conduct was that of a prudent man, but whether you think it was.[2]

Some middle point must be found between the horns of this dilemma.

The standards of the law are standards of general application. The law takes no account of the infinite varieties of temperament, intellect, and education which make the internal character of a given act so different in different men. It does not attempt to see men as God sees them, for more than one sufficient reason. In the first place, the impossibility of nicely measuring a man's powers and limitations is far clearer than that of ascertaining his knowledge of law, which has been thought to account for what is called the presumption that every man knows the law. But a more satisfactory explanation is, that, when men live in society, a certain average of conduct, a sacrifice of individual peculiarities going beyond a certain point, is necessary to the general welfare. If, for instance, a man is born hasty and awkward, is always having accidents and hurting himself or his neighbors, no doubt his congenital defects will be allowed for in the courts of Heaven, but his slips are no less troublesome to his neighbors than if they sprang from guilty neglect. His neighbors accordingly require him, at his proper peril, to come up to their standard, and the courts which they establish decline to take his personal equation into account.

The rule that the law does, in general, determine liability by blameworthiness, is subject to the limitation that minute differences of character are not allowed for. The law considers, in other words, what would be blameworthy in the average man, the man of ordinary intelligence and prudence, and determines liability by that. If we fall below the level in those gifts, it is our misfortune; so much as that we must have at our peril, for the reasons just given. But he who is intelligent and prudent does not act at his peril, in theory of law. On the contrary, it is only when he fails to exercise the foresight of which he is capable, or exercises it with evil intent, that he is answerable for the consequences.

There are exceptions to the principle that every man is presumed to possess ordinary capacity to avoid harm to his neighbors, which illustrate the rule, and also the moral basis of liability in general. When a man has a distinct defect of such a nature that all can recognize it as making certain precautions impossible, he will not be held answerable for not taking them. A blind man is not required to see at his peril; and although he is, no doubt, bound to consider his infirmity in regulating his actions, yet if he properly finds himself in a certain situation, the neglect of precautions requiring eyesight would not prevent his recovering for an injury to himself, and, it may be presumed, would not make him liable for injuring another. So it is held that, in cases where he is the plaintiff, an infant of very tender years is only bound to take the precautions of which an infant is capable; the same principle may be cautiously applied where he is defendant.[1] Insanity is a more difficult matter to deal with, and no general rule can be laid down about it. There is no doubt that in many cases a man may be insane, and yet perfectly capable of taking the precautions, and of being influenced by the motives, which the circumstances demand. But if insanity of a pronounced type exists, manifestly incapacitating the sufferer from complying with the rule which he has broken, good sense would require it to be admitted as an excuse.

Taking the qualification last established in connection with the general proposition previously laid down, it will now be assumed that, on the one hand, the law presumes or requires a man to possess ordinary capacity to avoid harming his neighbors, unless a clear and manifest incapacity be shown; but that, on the other, it does not in general hold him liable for unintentional injury, unless, possessing such capacity, he might and ought to have foreseen the danger, or, in other words, unless a man of ordinary intelligence and forethought would have been to blame for acting as he did. The next question is, whether this vague test is all that the law has to say upon the matter, and the same question in another form, by whom this test is to be applied.

[1] Cf. Bro. Corone, pl. 6; Neal v. Gillett, 23 Conn. 437, 442; D. 9. 2. 5, § 2; D. 48. 8. 12.

Notwithstanding the fact that the grounds of legal liability are moral to the extent above explained, it must be borne in mind that law only works within the sphere of the senses. If the external phenomena, the manifest acts and omissions, are such as it requires, it is wholly indifferent to the internal phenomena of conscience. A man may have as bad a heart as he chooses, if his conduct is within the rules. In other words, the standards of the law are external standards, and, however much it may take moral considerations into account, it does so only for the purpose of drawing a line between such bodily motions and rests as it permits, and such as it does not. What the law really forbids, and the only thing it forbids, is the act on the wrong side of the line, be that act blameworthy or otherwise.

Again, any legal standard must, in theory, be one which would apply to all men, not specially excepted, under the same circumstances. It is not intended that the public force should fall upon an individual accidentally, or at the whim of any body of men. The standard, that is, must be fixed. In practice, no doubt, one man may have to pay and another may escape, according to the different feelings of different juries. But this merely shows that the law does not perfectly accomplish its ends. The theory or intention of the law is not that the feeling of approbation or blame which a particular twelve may entertain should be the criterion. They are supposed to leave their idiosyncrasies on one side, and to represent the feeling of the community. The ideal average prudent man, whose equivalent the jury is taken to be in many cases, and whose culpability or innocence is the supposed test, is a constant, and his conduct under given circumstances is theoretically always the same.

Finally, any legal standard must, in theory, be capable of being known. When a man has to pay damages, he is supposed to have broken the law, and he is further supposed to have known what the law was.

If, now, the ordinary liabilities in tort arise from failure to comply with fixed and uniform standards of external conduct, which every man is presumed and required to know, it is obvious that it ought to be possible, sooner or later, to formulate these standards at least to some extent, and that to do so must at last be the business of the court. It is equally clear that the featureless generality, that the defendant was bound to use such care as a prudent man would do under the circumstances, ought to be continually giving place to the specific one, that he was bound to use this or that precaution under these or those circumstances. The standard which the defendant was bound to come up to was a standard of specific acts or omissions, with reference to the specific circumstances in which he found himself. If in the whole department of unintentional wrongs the courts arrived at no further utterance than the question of negligence, and left every case, without rudder or compass, to the jury, they would simply confess their inability to state a very large part of the law which they required the defendant to know, and would assert, by implication, that nothing could be learned by experience. But neither courts nor legislatures have ever stopped at that point.

From the time of Alfred to the present day, statutes and decisions have busied themselves with defining the precautions to be taken in certain familiar cases; that is, with substituting for the vague test of the care exercised by a prudent man, a precise one of specific acts or omissions. The fundamental thought is still the same, that the way prescribed is that in which prudent men are in the habit of acting, or else is one laid down for cases where prudent men might otherwise be in doubt.

It will be observed that the existence of the external tests of liability which will be mentioned, while it illustrates the tendency of the law of tort to become more and more concrete by judicial decision and by statute, does not interfere with the general doctrine maintained as to the grounds of liability. The argument of this Lecture, although opposed to the doctrine that a man acts or exerts force at his peril, is by no means opposed to the doctrine that he does certain particular acts at his peril. It is the coarseness, not the nature, of the standard which is objected to. If, when the question of the defendant's negligence is left to a jury, negligence does not mean the actual state of the defendant's mind, but a failure to act as a prudent man of average intelligence would have done, he is required to conform to an objective standard at his peril, even in that case. When a more exact and specific rule has been arrived at, he must obey that rule at his peril to the same extent. But, further, if the law is wholly a standard of external conduct, a man must always comply with that standard at his peril.

Some examples of the process of specification will be useful. In LL. Alfred, 36,[1] providing for the case of a man's staking himself on a spear carried by another, we read, "Let this (liability) be if the point be three fingers higher than the hindmost part of the shaft; if they be both on a level, . . . be that without danger."

The rule of the road and the sailing rules adopted by Congress from England are modern examples of such statutes. By the former rule, the question has been narrowed from the vague one, Was the party negligent? to the precise one, Was he on the right or left of the road? To avoid a possible misconception, it may be observed that, of course, this question does not necessarily and under all circumstances decide that of liability; a plaintiff may have been on the wrong side of the road, as he may have been negligent, and yet the conduct of the defendant may have been unjustifiable, and a ground of liability.[2] So, no doubt, a defendant could justify or excuse being on the wrong side, under some circumstances. The difference between alleging that a defendant was on the wrong side of the road, and that he was negligent, is the difference between an allegation of facts requiring to be excused by a counter allegation of further facts to prevent their being a ground of liability, and an allegation which involves a conclusion of law, and denies in advance the existence of an excuse. Whether the former allegation ought not to be enough, and whether the establishment of the fact ought not to shift the burden of proof, are questions which belong to the theory of pleading and evidence, and could be answered either way consistently with analogy. I should have no difficulty in saying that the allegation of facts which are ordinarily a ground of liability, and which would be so unless excused, ought to be sufficient. But the forms of the law, especially the forms of pleading, do not change with every change of its substance, and a prudent lawyer would use the broader and safer phrase.

The same course of specification which has been illustrated from the statute-book ought also to be taking place in the growth of judicial decisions. That this should happen is in accordance with the past history of the law. It has been suggested already that in the days of the assize and jurata the court decided whether the facts constituted a ground of liability in all ordinary cases. A question of negligence might, no doubt, have gone to the jury. Common sense and common knowledge are as often sufficient to determine whether proper care has been taken of an animal, as they are to say whether A or B owns it. The cases which first arose were not of a kind to suggest analysis, and negligence was used as a proximately simple element for a long time before the need or possibility of analysis was felt. Still, when an issue of this sort is found, the dispute is rather what the acts or omissions of the defendant were than on the standard of conduct.[1] The distinction between the functions of court and jury does not come in question until the parties differ as to the standard of conduct. Negligence, like ownership, is a complex conception. Just as the latter imports the existence of certain facts, and also the consequence (protection against all the world) which the law attaches to those facts, the former imports the existence of certain facts (conduct), and also the consequence (liability) which the law attaches to those facts. In most cases the question is upon the facts, and it is only occasionally that one arises on the consequence.

It will have been noticed how the judges pass on the defendant's acts (on grounds of fault and public policy) in the case of the thorns, and that in Weaver v. Ward[1] it is said that the facts constituting an excuse, and showing that the defendant was free from negligence, should have been spread upon the record, in order that the court might judge. A similar requirement was laid down with regard to the defence of probable cause in an action for malicious prosecution.[2] And to this day the question of probable cause is always passed on by the court. Later evidence will be found in what follows.

There is, however, an important consideration, which has not yet been adverted to. It is undoubtedly possible that those who have the making of the law should deem it wise to put the mark higher in some cases than the point established by common practice at which blameworthiness begins. For instance, in Morris v. Platt,[3] the court, while declaring in the strongest terms that, in general, negligence is the foundation of liability for accidental trespasses, nevertheless hints that, if a decision of the point were necessary, it might hold a defendant to a stricter rule where the damage was caused by a pistol, in view of the danger to the public of the growing habit of carrying deadly weapons. Again, it might well seem that to enter a man's house for the purpose of carrying a present, or inquiring after his health when he was ill, was a harmless and rather praiseworthy act, although crossing the owner's boundary was intentional. It is not supposed that an action would lie at the present day for such a cause, unless the defendant had been forbidden the house. Yet in the time of Henry VIII. it was said to be actionable if without license, "for then under that color my enemy might be in my house and kill me."[1] There is a clear case where public policy establishes a standard of overt acts without regard to fault in any sense. In like manner, policy established exceptions to the general prohibition against entering another's premises, as in the instance put by Chief Justice Choke in the Year Book, of a tree being blown over upon them, or when the highway became impassable, or for the purpose of keeping the peace.[2]

Another example may perhaps be found in the shape which has been given in modern times to the liability for animals, and in the derivative principle of Rylands v. Fletcher,[3] that when a person brings on his lands, and collects and keeps there, anything likely to do mischief if it escapes, he must keep it in at his peril; and, if he does not do so, is prima facie answerable for all the damage which is the natural consequence of its escape. Cases of this sort do not stand on the notion that it is wrong to keep cattle, or to have a reservoir of water, as might have been thought with more plausibility when fierce and useless animals only were in question.[1] It may even be very much for the public good that the dangerous accumulation should be made (a consideration which might influence the decision in some instances, and differently in different jurisdictions); but as there is a limit to the nicety of inquiry which is possible in a trial, it may be considered that the safest way to secure care is to throw the risk upon the person who decides what precautions shall be taken. The liability for trespasses of cattle seems to lie on the boundary line between rules based on policy irrespective of fault, and requirements intended to formulate the conduct of a prudent man.

It has been shown in the first Lecture how this liability for cattle arose in the early law, and how far the influence of early notions might be traced in the law of to-day. Subject to what is there said, it is evident that the early discussions turn on the general consideration whether the owner is or is not to blame.[2] But they do not stop there: they go on to take practical distinctions, based on common experience. Thus, when the defendant chased sheep out of his land with a dog, and as soon as the sheep were out called in his dog, but the dog pursued them into adjoining land, the chasing of the sheep beyond the defendant's line was held no trespass, because "the nature of a dog is such that he cannot be ruled suddenly."[3]

It was lawful in ploughing to turn the horses on adjoining land, and if while so turning the beasts took a mouthful of grass, or subverted the soil with the plough, against the will of the driver, he had a good justification, because the law will recognize that a man cannot at every instant govern his cattle as he will.[1] So it was said that, if a man be driving cattle through a town, and one of them goes into another man's house, and he follows him, trespass does not lie for this.[2] So it was said by Doderidge, J., in the same case, that if deer come into my land out of the forest, and I chase them with dogs, it is excuse enough for me to wind my horn to recall the dogs, because by this the warden of the forest has notice that a deer is being chased.[3]

The very case of Mason v. Keeling,[4] which is referred to in the first Lecture for its echo of primitive notions, shows that the working rules of the law had long been founded on good sense. With regard to animals not then treated as property, which in the main were the wilder animals, the law was settled that, "if they are of a tame nature, there must be notice of the ill quality; and the law takes notice, that a dog is not of a fierce nature, but rather the contrary."[5] If the animals "are such as are naturally mischievous in their kind, he shall answer for hurt done by them, without any notice."[1] The latter principle has been applied to the case of a bear,[2] and amply accounts for the liability of the owner of such animals as horses and oxen in respect of trespasses upon land, although, as has been seen, it was at one time thought to stand upon his ownership. It is said to be the universal nature of cattle to stray, and, when straying in cultivated land, to do damage by trampling down and eating the crops, whereas a dog does no harm. It is also said to be usual and easy to restrain them.[3] If, as has been suggested, the historical origin of the rule was different, it does not matter.

Following the same line of thought, the owner of cattle is not held absolutely answerable for all damage which they may do the person. According to Lord Holt in the above opinion, these animals, "which are not so familiar to mankind" as dogs, "the owner ought to confine, and take all reasonable caution that they do no mischief. . . . But . . . if the owner puts a horse or an ox to grass in his field, which is adjoining to the highway, and the horse or the ox breaks the hedge and runs into the highway, and kicks or gores some passenger, an action will not lie against the owner; otherwise, if he had notice that they had done such a thing before."

Perhaps the most striking authority for the position that the judge's duties are not at an end when the question of negligence is reached, is shown by the discussions concerning the law of bailment. Consider the judgment in Coggs v. Bernard,[1] the treatises of Sir William Jones and Story, and the chapter of Kent upon the subject. They are so many attempts to state the duty of the bailee specifically, according to the nature of the bailment and of the object bailed. Those attempts, to be sure, were not successful, partly because they were attempts to engraft upon the native stock a branch of the Roman law which was too large to survive the process, but more especially because the distinctions attempted were purely qualitative, and were therefore useless when dealing with a jury.[2] To instruct a jury that they must find the defendant guilty of gross negligence before he can be charged, is open to the reproach that for such a body the word "gross" is only a vituperative epithet. But it would not be so with a judge sitting in admiralty without a jury. The Roman law and the Supreme Court of the United States agree that the word means something.[3] Successful or not, it is enough for the present argument that the attempt has been made.

The principles of substantive law which have been established by the courts are believed to have been somewhat obscured by having presented themselves oftenest in the form of rulings upon the sufficiency of evidence. When a judge rules that there is no evidence of negligence, he does something more than is embraced in an ordinary ruling that there is no evidence of a fact. He rules that the acts or omissions proved or in question do not constitute a ground of legal liability, and in this way the law is gradually enriching itself from daily life, as it should. Thus, in Crafton v. Metropolitan Railway Co.,[1] the plaintiff slipped on the defendant's stairs and was severely hurt. The cause of his slipping was that the brass nosing of the stairs had been worn smooth by travel over it, and a builder testified that in his opinion the staircase was unsafe by reason of this circumstance and the absence of a hand-rail. There was nothing to contradict this except that great numbers of persons had passed over the stairs and that no accident had happened there, and the plaintiff had a verdict. The court set the verdict aside, and ordered a nonsuit. The ruling was in form that there was no evidence of negligence to go to the jury; but this was obviously equivalent to saying, and did in fact mean, that the railroad company had done all that it was bound to do in maintaining such a staircase as was proved by the plaintiff. A hundred other equally concrete instances will be found in the text-books.

On the other hand, if the court should rule that certain acts or omissions coupled with damage were conclusive evidence of negligence unless explained, it would, in substance and in truth, rule that such acts or omissions were a ground of liability,[2] or prevented a recovery, as the case might be. Thus it is said to be actionable negligence to let a house for a dwelling knowing it to be so infected with small-pox as to be dangerous to health, and concealing the knowledge.[3] To explain the acts or omissions in such a case would be to prove different conduct from that ruled upon, or to show that they were not, juridically speaking, the cause of the damage complained of. The ruling assumes, for the purposes of the ruling, that the facts in evidence are all the facts.

The cases which have raised difficulties needing explanation are those in which the court has ruled that there was prima facie evidence of negligence, or some evidence of negligence to go to the jury.

Many have noticed the confusion of thought implied in speaking of such cases as presenting mixed questions of law and fact. No doubt, as has been said above, the averment that the defendant has been guilty of negligence is a complex one: first, that he has done or omitted certain things; second, that his alleged conduct does not come up to the legal standard. And so long as the controversy is simply on the first half, the whole complex averment is plain matter for the jury without special instructions, just as a question of ownership would be where the only dispute was as to the fact upon which the legal conclusion was founded.[1] But when a controversy arises on the second half, the question whether the court or the jury ought to judge of the defendant's conduct is wholly unaffected by the accident, whether there is or is not also a dispute as to what that conduct was. If there is such a dispute, it is entirely possible to give a series of hypothetical instructions adapted to every state of facts which it is open to the jury to find. If there is no such dispute, the court may still take their opinion as to the standard. The problem is to explain the relative functions of court and jury with regard to the latter.

When a case arises in which the standard of conduct, pure and simple, is submitted to the jury, the explanation is plain. It is that the court, not entertaining any clear views of public policy applicable to the matter, derives the rule to be applied from daily experience, as it has been agreed that the great body of the law of tort has been derived. But the court further feels that it is not itself possessed of sufficient practical experience to lay down the rule intelligently. It conceives that twelve men taken from the practical part of the community can aid its judgment.[1] Therefore it aids its conscience by taking the opinion of the jury.

But supposing a state of facts often repeated in practice, is it to be imagined that the court is to go on leaving the standard to the jury forever? Is it not manifest, on the contrary, that if the jury is, on the whole, as fair a tribunal as it is represented to be, the lesson which can be got from that source will be learned? Either the court will find that the fair teaching of experience is that the conduct complained of usually is or is not blameworthy, and therefore, unless explained, is or is not a ground of liability; or it will find the jury oscillating to and fro, and will see the necessity of making up its mind for itself. There is no reason why any other such question should not be settled, as well as that of liability for stairs with smooth strips of brass upon their edges. The exceptions would mainly be found where the standard was rapidly changing, as, for instance, in some questions of medical treatment.[2]

If this be the proper conclusion in plain cases, further consequences ensue. Facts do not often exactly repeat themselves in practice; but cases with comparatively small variations from each other do. A judge who has long sat at nisi prius ought gradually to acquire a fund of experience which enables him to represent the common sense of the community in ordinary instances far better than an average jury. He should be able to lead and to instruct them in detail, even where he thinks it desirable, on the whole, to take their opinion. Furthermore, the sphere in which he is able to rule without taking their opinion at all should be continually growing.

It has often been said, that negligence is pure matter of fact, or that, after the court has declared the evidence to be such that negligence may be inferred from it, the jury are always to decide whether the inference shall be drawn.[1] But it is believed that the courts, when they lay down this broad proposition, are thinking of cases where the conduct to be passed upon is not proved directly, and the main or only question is what that conduct was, not what standard shall be applied to it after it is established.

Most cases which go to the jury on a ruling that there is evidence from which they may find negligence, do not go to them principally on account of a doubt as to the standard, but of a doubt as to the conduct. Take the case where the fact in proof is an event such as the dropping of a brick from a railway bridge over a highway upon the plaintiff, the fact must be inferred that the dropping was court ruled with regard to the defendant's conduct as has been mentioned, it held that whether the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in not having vaccinated his children was "a question of fact, and was properly left to the jury," p. 488.

due, not to a sudden operation of weather, but to a gradual falling out of repair which it was physically possible for the defendant to have prevented, before there can be any question as to the standard of conduct.[1]

So, in the case of a barrel falling from a warehouse window, it must be found that the defendant or his servants were in charge of it, before any question of standard can arise.[2] It will be seen that in each of these well-known cases the court assumed a rule which would make the defendant liable if his conduct was such as the evidence tended to prove. When there is no question as to the conduct established by the evidence, as in the case of a collision between two trains belonging to the same company, the jury have, sometimes at least, been told in effect that, if they believed the evidence, the defendant was liable.[3]

The principal argument that is urged in favor of the view that a more extended function belongs to the jury as matter of right, is the necessity of continually conforming our standards to experience. No doubt the general foundation of legal liability in blameworthiness, as determined by the existing average standards of the community, should always be kept in mind, for the purpose of keeping such concrete rules as from time to time may be laid down conformable to daily life. No doubt this conformity is the practical justification for requiring a man to know the civil law, as the fact that crimes are also generally sins is one of the practical justifications for requiring a man to know the criminal law. But these considerations only lead to the conclusion that precedents should be overruled when they become inconsistent with present conditions; and this has generally happened, except with regard to the construction of deeds and wills. On the other hand, it is very desirable to know as nearly as we can the standard by which we shall be judged at a given moment, and, moreover, the standards for a very large part of human conduct do not vary from century to century.

The considerations urged in this Lecture are of peculiar importance in this country, or at least in States where the law is as it stands in Massachusetts. In England, the judges at nisi prius express their opinions freely on the value and weight of the evidence, and the judges in banc, by consent of parties, constantly draw inferences of fact. Hence nice distinctions as to the province of court and jury are not of the first necessity. But when judges are forbidden by statute to charge the jury with respect to matters of fact, and when the court in banc will never hear a case calling for inferences of fact, it becomes of vital importance to understand that, when standards of conduct are left to the jury, it is a temporary surrender of a judicial function which may be resumed at any moment in any case when the court feels competent to do so. Were this not so, the almost universal acceptance of the first proposition in this Lecture, that the general foundation of liability for unintentional wrongs is conduct different from that of a prudent man under the circumstances, would leave all our rights and duties throughout a great part of the law to the necessarily more or less accidental feelings of a jury.

It is perfectly consistent with the views maintained in this Lecture that the courts have been very slow to withdraw questions of negligence from the jury, without distinguishing nicely whether the doubt concerned the facts or the standard to be applied. Legal, like natural divisions, however clear in their general outline, will be found on exact scrutiny to end in a penumbra or debatable land. This is the region of the jury, and only cases falling on this doubtful border are likely to be carried far in court. Still, the tendency of the law must always be to narrow the field of uncertainty. That is what analogy, as well as the decisions on this very subject, would lead us to expect.

The growth of the law is very apt to take place in this way. Two widely different cases suggest a general distinction, which is a clear one when stated broadly. But as new cases cluster around the opposite poles, and begin to approach each other, the distinction becomes more difficult to trace; the determinations are made one way or the other on a very slight preponderance of feeling, rather than of articulate reason; and at last a mathematical line is arrived at by the contact of contrary decisions, which is so far arbitrary that it might equally well have been drawn a little farther to the one side or to the other, but which must have been drawn somewhere in the neighborhood of where it falls.[1]

In this way exact distinctions have been worked out upon questions in which the elements to be considered are few. For instance, what is a reasonable time for presenting negotiable paper, or what is a difference in kind and what a difference only in quality, or the rule against perpetuities.

An example of the approach of decisions towards each other from the opposite poles, and of the function of the jury midway, is to be found in the Massachusetts adjudications, that, if a child of two years and four months is unnecessarily sent unattended across and down a street in a large city, he cannot recover for a negligent injury;[1] that to allow a boy of eight to be abroad alone is not necessarily negligent;[2] and that the effect of permitting a boy of ten to be abroad after dark is for the jury;[3] coupled with the statement, which may be ventured on without authority, that such a permission to a young man of twenty possessed of common intelligence has no effect whatever.

Take again the law of ancient lights in England. An obstruction to be actionable must be substantial. Under ordinary circumstances the erection of a structure a hundred yards off, and one foot above the ground, would not be actionable. One within a foot of the window, and covering it, would be, without any finding of a jury beyond these facts. In doubtful cases midway, the question whether the interference was substantial has been left to the jury.[4] But as the elements are few and permanent, an inclination has been shown to lay down a definite rule, that, in ordinary cases, the building complained of must not be higher than the distance of its base from the dominant windows. And although this attempt to work out an exact line requires much caution, it is entirely philosophical in spirit.[5]

The same principle applies to negligence. If the whole evidence in the case was that a party, in full command of his senses and intellect, stood on a railway track, looking at an approaching engine until it ran him down, no judge would leave it to the jury to say whether the conduct was prudent. If the whole evidence was that he attempted to cross a level track, which was visible for half a mile each way, and on which no engine was in sight, no court would allow a jury to find negligence. Between these extremes are cases which would go to the jury. But it is obvious that the limit of safety in such cases, supposing no further elements present, could be determined almost to a foot by mathematical calculation.

The trouble with many cases of negligence is, that they are of a kind not frequently recurring, so as to enable any given judge to profit by long experience with juries to lay down rules, and that the elements are so complex that courts are glad to leave the whole matter in a lump for the jury's determination.

I reserve the relation between negligent and other torts for the next Lecture.

THE PATH OF THE LAW.[1]

WHEN we study law we are not studying a mystery but a well known profession. We are studying what we shall want in order to appear before judges, or to advise people in such a way as to keep them out of court. The reason why it is a profession, why people will pay lawyers to argue for them or to advise them, is that in societies like ours the command of the public force is intrusted to the judges in certain cases, and the whole power of the state will be put forth, if necessary, to carry out their judgments and decrees. People want to know under what circumstances and how far they will run the risk of coming against what is so much stronger than themselves, and hence it becomes a business to find out when this danger is to be feared. The object of our study, then, is prediction, the prediction of the incidence of the public force through the instrumentality of the courts.

The means of the study are a body of reports, of treatises, and of statutes, in this country and in England, extending back for six hundred years, and now increasing annually by hundreds. In these sibylline leaves are gathered the scattered prophecies of the past upon the cases in which the axe will fall. These are what properly have been called the oracles of the law. Far the most important and pretty nearly the whole meaning of every new effort of legal thought is to make these prophecies more precise, and to generalize them into a thoroughly connected system. The process is one, from a lawyer's statement of a case, eliminating as it does all the dramatic elements with which his client's story has clothed it, and retaining only the facts of legal import, up to the final analyses and abstract universals of theoretic jurisprudence. The reason why a lawyer does not mention that his client wore a white hat when he made a contract, while Mrs. Quickly would be sure to dwell upon it along with the parcel gilt goblet and the sea-coal fire, is that he forsees that the public force will act in the same way whatever his client had upon his head. It is to make the prophecies easier to be remembered and to be understood that the teachings of the decisions of the past are put into general propositions and gathered into text-books, or that statutes are passed in a general form. The primary rights and duties with which jurisprudence busies itself again are nothing but prophecies. One of the many evil effects of the confusion between legal and moral ideas, about which I shall have something to say in a moment, is that theory is apt to get the cart before the horse, and to consider the right or the duty as something existing apart from and independent of the consequences of its breach, to which certain sanctions are added afterward. But, as I shall try to show, a legal duty so called is nothing but a prediction that if a man does or omits certain things he will be made to suffer in this or that way by judgment of the court; — and so of a legal right.

The number of our predictions when generalized and reduced to a system is not unmanageably large. They present themselves as a finite body of dogma which may be mastered within a reasonable time. It is a great mistake to be frightened by the ever increasing number of reports. The reports of a given jurisdiction in the course of a generation take up pretty much the whole body of the law, and restate it from the present point of view. We could reconstruct the corpus from them if all that went before were burned. The use of the earlier reports is mainly historical, a use about which I shall have something to say before I have finished.

I wish, if I can, to lay down some first principles for the study of this body of dogma or systematized prediction which we call the law, for men who want to use it as the instrument of their business to enable them to prophesy in their turn, and, as bearing upon the study, I wish to point out an ideal which as yet our law has not attained.

The first thing for a business-like understanding of the matter is to understand its limits, and therefore I think it desirable at once to point out and dispel a confusion between morality and law, which sometimes rises to the height of conscious theory, and more often and indeed constantly is making trouble in detail without reaching the point of consciousness. You can see very plainly that a bad man has as much reason as a good one for wishing to avoid an encounter with the public force, and therefore you can see the practical importance of the distinction between morality and law. A man who cares nothing for an ethical rule which is believed and practised by his neighbors is likely nevertheless to care a good deal to avoid being made to pay money, and will want to keep out of jail if he can.

I take it for granted that no hearer of mine will misinterpret what I have to say as the language of cynicism. The law is the witness and external deposit of our moral life. Its history is the history of the moral development of the race. The practice of it, in spite of popular jests, tends to make good citizens and good men. When I emphasize the difference between law and morals I do so with reference to a single end, that of learning and understanding the law. For that purpose you must definitely master its specific marks, and it is for that that I ask you for the moment to imagine yourselves indifferent to other and greater things.

I do not say that there is not a wider point of view from which the distinction between law and morals becomes of secondary or no importance, as all mathematical distinctions vanish in presence of the infinite. But I do say that that distinction is of the first importance for the object which we are here to consider, — a right study and mastery of the law as a business with well understood limits, a body of dogma enclosed within definite lines. I have just shown the practical reason for saying so. If you want to know the law and nothing else, you must look at it as a bad man, who cares only for the material consequences which such knowledge enables him to predict, not as a good one, who finds his reasons for conduct, whether inside the law or outside of it, in the vaguer sanctions of conscience. The theoretical importance of the distinction is no less, if you would reason on your subject aright. The law is full of phraseology drawn from morals, and by the mere force of language continually invites us to pass from one domain to the other without perceiving it, as we are sure to do unless we have the boundary constantly before our minds. The law talks about rights, and duties, and malice, and intent, and negligence, and so forth, and nothing is easier, or, I may say, more common in legal reasoning, than to take these words in their moral sense, at some stage of the argument, and so to drop into fallacy. For instance, when we speak of the rights of man in a moral sense, we mean to mark the limits of interference with individual freedom which we think are prescribed by conscience, or by our ideal, however reached. Yet it is certain that many laws have been enforced in the past, and it is likely that some are enforced now, which are condemned by the most enlightened opinion of the time, or which at all events pass the limit of interference as many consciences would draw it. Manifestly, therefore, nothing but confusion of thought can result from assuming that the rights of man in a moral sense are equally rights in the sense of the Constitution and the law. No doubt simple and extreme cases can be put of imaginable laws which the statute-making power would not dare to enact, even in the absence of written constitutional prohibitions, because the community would rise in rebellion and fight; and this gives some plausibility to the proposition that the law, if not a part of morality, is limited by it. But this limit of power is not coextensive with any system of morals. For the most part it falls far within the lines of any such system, and in some cases may extend beyond them, for reasons drawn from the habits of a particular people at a particular time. I once heard the late Professor Agassiz say that a German population would rise if you added two cents to the price of a glass of beer. A statute in such a case would be empty words, not because it was wrong, but because it could not be enforced. No one will deny that wrong statutes can be and are enforced, and we should not all agree as to which were the wrong ones.

The confusion with which I am dealing besets confessedly legal conceptions. Take the fundamental question, What constitutes the law? You will find some text writers telling you that it is something different from what is decided by the courts of Massachusetts or England, that it is a system of reason, that it is a deduction from principles of ethics or admitted axioms or what not, which may or may not coincide with the decisions. But if we take the view of our friend the bad man we shall find that he does not care two straws for the axioms or deductions, but that he does want to know what the Massachusetts or English courts are likely to do in fact. I am much of his mind. The prophecies of what the courts will do in fact, and nothing more pretentious, are what I mean by the law.

Take again a notion which as popularly understood is the widest conception which the law contains; — the notion of legal duty, to which already I have referred. We fill the word with all the content which we draw from morals. But what does it mean to a bad man? Mainly, and in the first place, a prophecy that if he does certain things he will be subjected to disagreeable consequences by way of imprisonment or compulsory payment of money. But from his point of view, what is the difference between being fined and being taxed a certain sum for doing a certain thing? That his point of view is the test of legal principles is shown by the many discussions which have arisen in the courts on the very question whether a given statutory liability is a penalty or a tax. On the answer to this question depends the decision whether conduct is legally wrong or right, and also whether a man is under compulsion or free. Leaving the criminal law on one side, what is the difference between the liability under the mill acts or statutes authorizing a taking by eminent domain and the liability for what we call a wrongful conversion of property where restoration is out of the question? In both cases the party taking another man's property has to pay its fair value as assessed by a jury, and no more. What significance is there in calling one taking right and another wrong from the point of view of the law? It does not matter, so far as the given consequence, the compulsory payment, is concerned, whether the act to which it is attached is described in terms of praise or in terms of blame, or whether the law purports to prohibit it or to allow it. If it matters at all, still speaking from the bad man's point of view, it must be because in one case and not in the other some further disadvantages, or at least some further consequences, are attached to the act by the law. The only other disadvantages thus attached to it which I ever have been able to think of are to be found in two somewhat insignificant legal doctrines, both of which might be abolished without much disturbance. One is, that a contract to do a prohibited act is unlawful, and the other, that, if one of two or more joint wrongdoers has to pay all the damages, he cannot recover contribution from his fellows. And that I believe is all. You see how the vague circumference of the notion of duty shrinks and at the same time grows more precise when we wash it with cynical acid and expel everything except the object of our study, the operations of the law.

Nowhere is the confusion between legal and moral ideas more manifest than in the law of contract. Among other things, here again the so called primary rights and duties are invested with a mystic significance beyond what can be assigned and explained. The duty to keep a contract at common law means a prediction that you must pay damages if you do not keep it, — and nothing else. If you commit a tort, you are liable to pay a compensatory sum. If you commit a contract, you are liable to pay a compensatory sum unless the promised event comes to pass, and that is all the difference. But such a mode of looking at the matter stinks in the nostrils of those who think it advantageous to get as much ethics into the law as they can. It was good enough for Lord Coke, however, and here, as in many other cases, I am content to abide with him. In Bromage v. Genning,[1] a prohibition was sought in the King's Bench against a suit in the marches of Wales for the specific performance of a covenant to grant a lease, and Coke said that it would subvert the intention of the covenantor, since he intends it to be at his election either to lose the damages or to make the lease. Sergeant Harris for the plaintiff confessed that he moved the matter against his conscience, and a prohibition was granted. This goes further than we should go now, but it shows what I venture to say has been the common law point of view from the beginning, although Mr. Harriman, in his very able little book upon Contracts has been misled, as I humbly think, to a different conclusion.

I have spoken only of the common law, because there are some cases in which a logical justification can be found for speaking of civil liabilities as imposing duties in an intelligible sense. These are the relatively few in which equity will grant an injunction, and will enforce it by putting the defendant in prison or otherwise punishing him unless he complies with the order of the court. But I hardly think it advisable to shape general theory from the exception, and I think it would be better to cease troubling ourselves about primary rights and sanctions altogether, than to describe our prophecies concerning the liabilities commonly imposed by the law in those inappropriate terms.

I mentioned, as other examples of the use by the law of words drawn from morals, malice, intent, and negligence. It is enough to take malice as it is used in the law of civil liability for wrongs, — what we lawyers call the law of torts, — to show you that it means something different in law from what it means in morals, and also to show how the difference has been obscured by giving to principles which have little or nothing to do with each other the same name. Three hundred years ago a parson preached a sermon and told a story out of Fox's Book of Martyrs of a man who had assisted at the torture of one of the saints, and afterward died, suffering compensatory inward torment. It happened that Fox was wrong. The man was alive and chanced to hear the sermon, and thereupon he sued the parson. Chief Justice Wray instructed the jury that the defendant was not liable, because the story was told innocently, without malice. He took malice in the moral sense, as importing a malevolent motive. But nowadays no one doubts that a man may be liable, without any malevolent motive at all, for false statements manifestly calculated to inflict temporal damage. In stating the case in pleading, we still should call the defendant's conduct malicious; but, in my opinion at least, the word means nothing about motives, or even about the defendant's attitude toward the future, but only signifies that the tendency of his conduct under the known circumstances was very plainly to cause the plaintiff temporal harm.[1]

In the law of contract the use of moral phraseology has led to equal confusion, as I have shown in part already, but only in part. Morals deal with the actual internal state of the individual's mind, what he actually intends. From the time of the Romans down to now, this mode of dealing has affected the language of the law as to contract, and the language used has reacted upon the thought. We talk about a contract as a meeting of the minds of the parties, and thence it is inferred in various cases that there is no contract because their minds have not met; that is, because they have intended different things or because one party has not known of the assent of the other. Yet nothing is more certain than that parties may be bound by a contract to things which neither of them intended, and when one does not know of the other's assent. Suppose a contract is executed in due form and in writing to deliver a lecture, mentioning no time. One of the parties thinks that the promise will be construed to mean at once, within a week. The other thinks that it means when he is ready. The court says that it means within a reasonable time. The parties are bound by the contract as it is interpreted by the court, yet neither of them meant what the court declares that they have said. In my opinion no one will understand the true theory of contract or be able even to discuss some fundamental questions intelligently until he has understood that all contracts are formal, that the making of a contract depends not on the agreement of two minds in one intention, but on the agreement of two sets of external signs, — not on the parties' having meant the same thing but on their having said the same thing. Furthermore, as the signs may be addressed to one sense or another, — to sight or to hearing, — on the nature of the sign will depend the moment when the contract is made. If the sign is tangible, for instance, a letter, the contract is made when the letter of acceptance is delivered. If it is necessary that the minds of the parties meet, there will be no contract until the acceptance can be read, — none, for example, if the acceptance be snatched from the hand of the offerer by a third person.

This is not the time to work out a theory in detail, or to answer many obvious doubts and questions which are suggested by these general views. I know of none which are not easy to answer, but what I am trying to do now is only by a series of hints to throw some light on the narrow path of legal doctrine, and upon two pitfalls which, as it seems to me, lie perilously near to it. Of the first of these I have said enough. I hope that my illustrations have shown the danger, both to speculation and to practice, of confounding morality with law, and the trap which legal language lays for us on that side of our way. For my own part, I often doubt whether it would not be a gain if every word of moral significance could be banished from the law altogether, and other words adopted which should convey legal ideas uncolored by anything outside the law. We should lose the fossil records of a good deal of history and the majesty got from ethical associations, but by ridding ourselves of an unnecessary confusion we should gain very much in the clearness of our thought.

So much for the limits of the law. The next thing which I wish to consider is what are the forces which determine its content and its growth. You may assume, with Hobbes and Bentham and Austin, that all law emanates from the sovereign, even when the first human beings to enunciate it are the judges, or you may think that law is the voice of the Zeitgeist, or what you like. It is all one to my present purpose. Even if every decision required the sanction of an emperor with despotic power and a whimsical turn of mind, we should be interested none the less, still with a view to prediction, in discovering some order, some rational explanation, and some principle of growth for the rules which he laid down. In every system there are such explanations and principles to be found. It is with regard to them that a second fallacy comes in, which I think it important to expose.

The fallacy to which I refer is the notion that the only force at work in the development of the law is logic. In the broadest sense, indeed, that notion would be true. The postulate on which we think about the universe is that there is a fixed quantitative relation between every phenomenon and its antecedents and consequents. If there is such a thing as a phenomenon without these fixed quantitative relations, it is a miracle. It is outside the law of cause and effect, and as such transcends our power of thought, or at least is something to or from which we cannot reason. The condition of our thinking about the universe is that it is capable of being thought about rationally, or, in other words, that every part of it is effect and cause in the same sense in which those parts are with which we are most familiar. So in the broadest sense it is true that the law is a logical development, like everything else. The danger of which I speak is not the admission that the principles governing other phenomena also govern the law, but the notion that a given system, ours, for instance, can be worked out like mathematics from some general axioms of conduct. This is the natural error of the schools, but it is not confined to them. I once heard a very eminent judge say that he never let a decision go until he was absolutely sure that it was right. So judicial dissent often is blamed, as if it meant simply that one side or the other were not doing their sums right, and, if they would take more trouble, agreement inevitably would come.

This mode of thinking is entirely natural. The training of lawyers is a training in logic. The processes of analogy, discrimination, and deduction are those in which they are most at home. The language of judicial decision is mainly the language of logic.

And the logical method and form flatter that longing for certainty and for repose which is in every human mind. But certainty generally is illusion, and repose is not the destiny of man. Behind the logical form lies a judgment as to the relative worth and importance of competing legislative grounds, often an inarticulate and unconscious judgment, it is true, and yet the very root and nerve of the whole proceeding. You can give any conclusion a logical form. You always can imply a condition in a contract. But why do you imply it? It is because of some belief as to the practice of the community or of a class, or because of some opinion as to policy, or, in short, because of some attitude of yours upon a matter not capable of exact quantitative measurement, and therefore not capable of founding exact logical conclusions. Such matters really are battle grounds where the means do not exist for determinations that shall be good for all time, and where the decision can do no more than embody the preference of a given body in a given time and place. We do not realize how large a part of our law is open to reconsideration upon a slight change in the habit of the public mind. No concrete proposition is self-evident, no matter how ready we may be to accept it, not even Mr. Herbert Spencer's Every man has a right to do what he wills, provided he interferes not with a like right on the part of his neighbors.

Why is a false and injurious statement privileged, if it is made honestly in giving information about a servant? It is because it has been thought more important that information should be given freely, than that a man should be protected from what under other circumstances would be an actionable wrong. Why is a man at liberty to set up a business which he knows will ruin his neighbor? It is because the public good is supposed to be best subserved by free competition. Obviously such judgments of relative importance may vary in different times and places. Why does a judge instruct a jury that an employer is not liable to an employee for an injury received in the course of his employment unless he is negligent, and why do the jury generally find for the plaintiff if the case is allowed to go to them? It is because the traditional policy of our law is to confine liability to cases where a prudent man might have foreseen the injury, or at least the danger, while the inclination of a very large part of the community is to make certain classes of persons insure the safety of those with whom they deal. Since the last words were written, I have seen the requirement of such insurance put forth as part of the programme of one of the best known labor organizations. There is a concealed, half conscious battle on the question of legislative policy, and if any one thinks that it can be settled deductively, or once for all, I only can say that I think he is theoretically wrong, and that I am certain that his conclusion will not be accepted in practice semper ubique et ab omnibus.

Indeed, I think that even now our theory upon this matter is open to reconsideration, although I am not prepared to say how I should decide if a reconsideration were proposed. Our law of torts comes from the old days of isolated, ungeneralized wrongs, assaults, slanders, and the like, where the damages might be taken to lie where they fell by legal judgment. But the torts with which our courts are kept busy to-day are mainly the incidents of certain well known businesses. They are injuries to person or property by railroads, factories, and the like. The liability for them is estimated, and sooner or later goes into the price paid by the public. The public really pays the damages, and the question of liability, if pressed far enough, is really the question how far it is desirable that the public should insure the safety of those whose work it uses. It might be said that in such cases the chance of a jury finding for the defendant is merely a chance, once in a while rather arbitrarily interrupting the regular course of recovery, most likely in the case of an unusually conscientious plaintiff, and therefore better done away with. On the other hand, the economic value even of a life to the community can be estimated, and no recovery, it may be said, ought to go beyond that amount. It is conceivable that some day in certain cases we may find ourselves imitating, on a higher plane, the tariff for life and limb which we see in the Leges Barbarorum.

I think that the judges themselves have failed adequately to recognize their duty of weighing considerations of social advantage. The duty is inevitable, and the result of the often proclaimed judicial aversion to deal with such considerations is simply to leave the very ground and foundation of judgments inarticulate, and often unconscious, as I have said. When socialism first began to be talked about, the comfortable classes of the community were a good deal frightened. I suspect that this fear has influenced judicial action both here and in England, yet it is certain that it is not a conscious factor in the decisions to which I refer. I think that something similar has led people who no longer hope to control the legislatures to look to the courts as expounders of the Constitutions, and that in some courts new principles have been discovered outside the bodies of those instruments, which may be generalized into acceptance of the economic doctrines which prevailed about fifty years ago, and a wholesale prohibition of what a tribunal of lawyers does not think about right. I cannot but believe that if the training of lawyers led them habitually to consider more definitely and explicitly the social advantage on which the rule they lay down must be justified, they sometimes would hesitate where now they are confident, and see that really they were taking sides upon debatable and often burning questions.

So much for the fallacy of logical form. Now let us consider the present condition of the law as a subject for study, and the ideal toward which it tends. We still are far from the point of view which I desire to see reached. No one has reached it or can reach it as yet. We are only at the beginning of a philosophical reaction, and of a reconsideration of the worth of doctrines which for the most part still are taken for granted without any deliberate, conscious, and systematic questioning of their grounds. The development of our law has gone on for nearly a thousand years, like the development of a plant, each generation taking the inevitable next step, mind, like matter, simply obeying a law of spontaneous growth. It is perfectly natural and right that it should have been so. Imitation is a necessity of human nature, as has been illustrated by a remarkable French writer, M. Tarde, in an admirable book, "Les Lois de l'Imitation." Most of the things we do, we do for no better reason than that our fathers have done them or that our neighbors do them, and the same is true of a larger part than we suspect of what we think. The reason is a good one, because our short life gives us no time for a better, but it is not the best. It does not follow, because we all are compelled to take on faith at second hand most of the rules on which we base our action and our thought, that each of us may not try to set some corner of his world in the order of reason, or that all of us collectively should not aspire to carry reason as far as it will go throughout the whole domain. In regard to the law, it is true, no doubt, that an evolutionist will hesitate to affirm universal validity for his social ideals, or for the principles which he thinks should be embodied in legislation. He is content if he can prove them best for here and now. He may be ready to admit that he knows nothing about an absolute best in the cosmos, and even that he knows next to nothing about a permanent best for men. Still it is true that a body of law is more rational and more civilized when every rule it contains is referred articulately and definitely to an end which it subserves, and when the grounds for desiring that end are stated or are ready to be stated in words.

At present, in very many cases, if we want to know why a rule of law has taken its particular shape, and more or less if we want to know why it exists at all, we go to tradition. We follow it into the Year Books, and perhaps beyond them to the customs of the Salian Franks, and somewhere in the past, in the German forests, in the needs of Norman kings, in the assumptions of a dominant class, in the absence of generalized ideas, we find out the practical motive for what now best is justified by the mere fact of its acceptance and that men are accustomed to it. The rational study of law is still to a large extent the study of history. History must be a part of the study, because without it we cannot know the precise scope of rules which it is our business to know. It is a part of the rational study, because it is the first step toward an enlightened scepticism, that is, toward a deliberate reconsideration of the worth of those rules. When you get the dragon out of his cave on to the plain and in the daylight, you can count his teeth and claws, and see just what is his strength. But to get him out is only the first step. The next is either to kill him, or to tame him and make him a useful animal. For the rational study of the law the black-letter man may be the man of the present, but the man of the future is the man of statistics and the master of economics. It is revolting to have no better reason for a rule of law than that so it was laid down in the time of Henry IV. It is still more revolting if the grounds upon which it was laid down have vanished long since, and the rule simply persists from blind imitation of the past. I am thinking of the technical rule as to trespass ab initio, as it is called, which I attempted to explain in a recent Massachusetts case.[1]

Let me take an illustration, which can be stated in a few words, to show how the social end which is aimed at by a rule of law is obscured and only partially attained in consequence of the fact that the rule owes its form to a gradual historical development, instead of being reshaped as a whole, with conscious articulate reference to the end in view. We think it desirable to prevent one man's property being misappropriated by another, and so we make larceny a crime. The evil is the same whether the misappropriation is made by a man into whose hands the owner has put the property, or by one who wrongfully takes it away. But primitive law in its weakness did not get much beyond an effort to prevent violence, and very naturally made a wrongful taking, a trespass, part of its definition of the crime. In modern times the judges enlarged the definition a little by holding that, if the wrongdoer gets possession by a trick or device, the crime is committed. This really was giving up the requirement of a trespass, and it would have been more logical, as well as truer to the present object of the law, to abandon the requirement altogether. That, however, would have seemed too bold, and was left to statute. Statutes were passed making embezzlement a crime. But the force of tradition caused the crime of embezzlement to be regarded as so far distinct from larceny that to this day, in some jurisdictions at least, a slip corner is kept open for thieves to contend, if indicted for larceny, that they should have been indicted for embezzlement, and if indicted for embezzlement, that they should have been indicted for larceny, and to escape on that ground.

Far more fundamental questions still await a better answer than that we do as our fathers have done. What have we better than a blind guess to show that the criminal law in its present form does more good than harm? I do not stop to refer to the effect which it has had in degrading prisoners and in plunging them further into crime, or to the question whether fine and imprisonment do not fall more heavily on a criminal's wife and children than on himself. I have in mind more far-reaching questions. Does punishment deter? Do we deal with criminals on proper principles? A modern school of Continental criminalists plumes itself on the formula, first suggested, it is said, by Gall, that we must consider the criminal rather than the crime. The formula does not carry us very far, but the inquiries which have been started look toward an answer of my questions based on science for the first time. If the typical criminal is a degenerate, bound to swindle or to murder by as deep seated an organic necessity as that which makes the rattlesnake bite, it is idle to talk of deterring him by the classical method of imprisonment. He must be got rid of; he cannot be improved, or frightened out of his structural reaction. If, on the other hand, crime, like normal human conduct, is mainly a matter of imitation, punishment fairly may be expected to help to keep it out of fashion. The study of criminals has been thought by some well known men of science to sustain the former hypothesis. The statistics of the relative increase of crime in crowded places like large cities, where example has the greatest chance to work, and in less populated parts, where the contagion spreads more slowly, have been used with great force in favor of the latter view. But there is weighty authority for the belief that, however this may be, "not the nature of the crime, but the dangerousness of the criminal, constitutes the only reasonable legal criterion to guide the inevitable social reaction against the criminal."[1]

The impediments to rational generalization, which I illustrated from the law of larceny, are shown in the other branches of the law, as well as in that of crime. Take the law of tort or civil liability for damages apart from contract and the like. Is there any general theory of such liability, or are the cases in which it exists simply to be enumerated, and to be explained each on its special ground, as is easy to believe from the fact that the right of action for certain well known classes of wrongs like trespass or slander has its special history for each class? I think that there is a general theory to be discovered, although resting in tendency rather than established and accepted. I think that the law regards the infliction of temporal damage by a responsible person as actionable, if under the circumstances known to him the danger of his act is manifest according to common experience, or according to his own experience if it is more than common, except in cases where upon special grounds of policy the law refuses to protect the plaintiff or grants a privilege to the defendant.[2] I think that commonly malice, intent, and negligence mean only that the danger was manifest to a greater or less degree, under the circumstances known to the actor, although in some cases of privilege malice may mean an actual malevolent motive, and such a motive may take away a permission knowingly to inflict harm, which otherwise would be granted on this or that ground of dominant public good. But when I stated my view to a very eminent English judge the other day, he said: "You are discussing what the law ought to be; as the law is, you must show a right. A man is not liable for negligence unless he is subject to a duty." If our difference was more than a difference in words, or with regard to the proportion between the exceptions and the rule, then, in his opinion, liability for an act cannot be referred to the manifest tendency of the act to cause temporal damage in general as a sufficient explanation, but must be referred to the special nature of the damage, or must be derived from some special circumstances outside of the tendency of the act, for which no generalized explanation exists. I think that such a view is wrong, but it is familiar, and I dare say generally is accepted in England.

[2] An example of the law's refusing to protect the plaintiff is when he is interrupted by a stranger in the use of a valuable way, which he has travelled adversely for a week less than the period of prescription. A week later he will have gained a right, but now he is only a trespasser. Examples of privilege I have given already. One of the best is competition in business.

Everywhere the basis of principle is tradition, to such an extent that we even are in danger of making the rôle of history more important than it is. The other day Professor Ames wrote a learned article to show, among other things, that the common law did not recognize the defence of fraud in actions upon specialties, and the moral might seem to be that the personal character of that defence is due to its equitable origin. But if, as I have said, all contracts are formal, the difference is not merely historical, but theoretic, between defects of form which prevent a contract from being made, and mistaken motives which manifestly could not be considered in any system that we should call rational except against one who was privy to those motives. It is not confined to specialties, but is of universal application. I ought to add that I do not suppose that Mr. Ames would disagree with what I suggest.

However, if we consider the law of contract, we find it full of history. The distinctions between debt, covenant, and assumpsit are merely historical. The classification of certain obligations to pay money, imposed by the law irrespective of any bargain as quasi contracts, is merely historical. The doctrine of consideration is merely historical. The effect given to a seal is to be explained by history alone. — Consideration is a mere form. Is it a useful form? If so, why should it not be required in all contracts? A seal is a mere form, and is vanishing in the scroll and in enactments that a consideration must be given, seal or no seal. — Why should any merely historical distinction be allowed to affect the rights and obligations of business men?

Since I wrote this discourse I have come on a very good example of the way in which tradition not only overrides rational policy, but overrides it after first having been misunderstood and having been given a new and broader scope than it had when it had a meaning. It is the settled law of England that a material alteration of a written contract by a party avoids it as against him. The doctrine is contrary to the general tendency of the law. We do not tell a jury that if a man ever has lied in one particular he is to be presumed to lie in all. Even if a man has tried to defraud, it seems no sufficient reason for preventing him from proving the truth. Objections of like nature in general go to the weight, not to the admissibility, of evidence. Moreover, this rule is irrespective of fraud, and is not confined to evidence. It is not merely that you cannot use the writing, but that the contract is at an end. What does this mean? The existence of a written contract depends on the fact that the offerer and offeree have interchanged their written expressions, not on the continued existence of those expressions. But in the case of a bond the primitive notion was different. The contract was inseparable from the parchment. If a stranger destroyed it, or tore off the seal, or altered it, the obligee could not recover, however free from fault, because the defendant's contract, that is, the actual tangible bond which he had sealed, could not be produced in the form in which it bound him. About a hundred years ago Lord Kenyon undertook to use his reason on this tradition, as he sometimes did to the detriment of the law, and, not understanding it, said he could see no reason why what was true of a bond should not be true of other contracts. His decision happened to be right, as it concerned a promissory note, where again the common law regarded the contract as inseparable from the paper on which it was written, but the reasoning was general, and soon was extended to other written contracts, and various absurd and unreal grounds of policy were invented to account for the enlarged rule.

I trust that no one will understand me to be speaking with disrespect of the law, because I criticise it so freely. I venerate the law, and especially our system of law, as one of the vastest products of the human mind. No one knows better than I do the countless number of great intellects that have spent themselves in making some addition or improvement, the greatest of which is trifling when compared with the mighty whole. It has the final title to respect that it exists, that it is not a Hegelian dream, but a part of the lives of men. But one may criticise even what one reveres. Law is the business to which my life is devoted, and I should show less than devotion if I did not do what in me lies to improve it, and, when I perceive what seems to me the ideal of its future, if I hesitated to point it out and to press toward it with all my heart.

Perhaps I have said enough to show the part which the study of history necessarily plays in the intelligent study of the law as it is to-day. In the teaching of this school and at Cambridge it is in no danger of being undervalued. Mr. Bigelow here and Mr. Ames and Mr. Thayer there have made important contributions which will not be forgotten, and in England the recent history of early English law by Sir Frederick Pollock and Mr. Maitland has lent the subject an almost deceptive charm. We must beware of the pitfall of antiquarianism, and must remember that for our purposes our only interest in the past is for the light it throws upon the present. I look forward to a time when the part played by history in the explanation of dogma shall be very small, and instead of ingenious research we shall spend our energy on a study of the ends sought to be attained and the reasons for desiring them. As a step toward that ideal it seems to me that every lawyer ought to seek an understanding of economics. The present divorce between the schools of political economy and law seems to me an evidence of how much progress in philosophical study still remains to be made. In the present state of political economy, indeed, we come again upon history on a larger scale, but there we are called on to consider and weigh the ends of legislation, the means of attaining them, and the cost. We learn that for everything we have to give up something else, and we are taught to set the advantage we gain against the other advantage we lose, and to know what we are doing when we elect.

There is another study which sometimes is undervalued by the practical minded, for which I wish to say a good word, although I think a good deal of pretty poor stuff goes under that name. I mean the study of what is called jurisprudence. Jurisprudence, as I look at it, is simply law in its most generalized part. Every effort to reduce a case to a rule is an effort of jurisprudence, although the name as used in English is confined to the broadest rules and most fundamental conceptions. One mark of a great lawyer is that he sees the application of the broadest rules. There is a story of a Vermont justice of the peace before whom a suit was brought by one farmer against another for breaking a churn. The justice took time to consider, and then said that he had looked through the statutes and could find nothing about churns, and gave judgment for the defendant. The same state of mind is shown in all our common digests and text-books. Applications of rudimentary rules of contract or tort are tucked away under the head of Railroads or Telegraphs or go to swell treatises on historical subdivisions, such as Shipping or Equity, or are gathered under an arbitrary title which is thought likely to appeal to the practical mind, such as Mercantile Law. If a man goes into law it pays to be a master of it, and to be a master of it means to look straight through all the dramatic incidents and to discern the true basis for prophecy. Therefore, it is well to have an accurate notion of what you mean by law, by a right, by a duty, by malice, intent, and negligence, by ownership, by possession, and so forth. I have in my mind cases in which the highest courts seem to me to have floundered because they had no clear ideas on some of these themes. I have illustrated their importance already. If a further illustration is wished, it may be found by reading the Appendix to Sir James Stephen's Criminal Law on the subject of possession, and then turning to Pollock and Wright's enlightened book. Sir James Stephen is not the only writer whose attempts to analyze legal ideas have been confused by striving for a useless quintessence of all systems, instead of an accurate anatomy of one. The trouble with Austin was that he did not know enough English law. But still it is a practical advantage to master Austin, and his predecessors, Hobbes and Bentham, and his worthy successors, Holland and Pollock. Sir Frederick Pollock's recent little book is touched with the felicity which marks all his works, and is wholly free from the perverting influence of Roman models.

The advice of the elders to young men is very apt to be as unreal as a list of the hundred best books. At least in my day I had my share of such counsels, and high among the unrealities I place the recommendation to study the Roman law. I assume that such advice means more than collecting a few Latin maxims with which to ornament the discourse, — the purpose for which Lord Coke recommended Bracton. If that is all that is wanted, the title "De Regulis Juris Antiqui" can be read in an hour. I assume that, if it is well to study the Roman law, it is well to study it as a working system. That means mastering a set of technicalities more difficult and less understood than our own, and studying another course of history by which even more than our own the Roman law must be explained. If any one doubts me, let him read Keller's "Der Römische Civil Process und die Actionen," a treatise on the prætor's edict, Muirhead's most interesting "Historical Introduction to the Private Law of Rome," and, to give him the best chance possible, Sohm's admirable Institutes. No. The way to gain a liberal view of your subject is not to read something else, but to get to the bottom of the subject itself. The means of doing that are, in the first place, to follow the existing body of dogma into its highest generalizations by the help of jurisprudence; next, to discover from history how it has come to be what it is; and, finally, so far as you can, to consider the ends which the several rules seek to accomplish, the reasons why those ends are desired, what is given up to gain them, and whether they are worth the price.

We have too little theory in the law rather than too much, especially on this final branch of study. When I was speaking of history, I mentioned larceny as an example to show how the law suffered from not having embodied in a clear form a rule which will accomplish its manifest purpose. In that case the trouble was due to the survival of forms coming from a time when a more limited purpose was entertained. Let me now give an example to show the practical importance, for the decision of actual cases, of understanding the reasons of the law, by taking an example from rules which, so far as I know, never have been explained or theorized about in any adequate way. I refer to statutes of limitation and the law of prescription. The end of such rules is obvious, but what is the justification for depriving a man of his rights, a pure evil as far as it goes, in consequence of the lapse of time? Sometimes the loss of evidence is referred to, but that is a secondary matter. Sometimes the desirability of peace, but why is peace more desirable after twenty years than before? It is increasingly likely to come without the aid of legislation. Sometimes it is said that, if a man neglects to enforce his rights, he cannot complain if, after a while, the law follows his example. Now if this is all that can be said about it, you probably will decide a case I am going to put, for the plaintiff; if you take the view which I shall suggest, you possibly will decide it for the defendant. A man is sued for trespass upon land, and justifies under a right of way. He proves that he has used the way openly and adversely for twenty years, but it turns out that the plaintiff had granted a license to a person whom he reasonably supposed to be the defendant's agent, although not so in fact, and therefore had assumed that the use of the way was permissive, in which case no right would be gained. Has the defendant gained a right or not? If his gaining it stands on the fault and neglect of the landowner in the ordinary sense, as seems commonly to be supposed, there has been no such neglect, and the right of way has not been acquired. But if I were the defendant's counsel, I should suggest that the foundation of the acquisition of rights by lapse of time is to be looked for in the position of the person who gains them, not in that of the loser. Sir Henry Maine has made it fashionable to connect the archaic notion of property with prescription. But the connection is further back than the first recorded history. It is in the nature of man's mind. A thing which you have enjoyed and used as your own for a long time, whether property or an opinion, takes root in your being and cannot be torn away without your resenting the act and trying to defend yourself, however you came by it. The law can ask no better justification than the deepest instincts of man. It is only by way of reply to the suggestion that you are disappointing the former owner, that you refer to his neglect having allowed the gradual dissociation between himself and what he claims, and the gradual association of it with another. If he knows that another is doing acts which on their face show that he is on the way toward establishing such an association, I should argue that in justice to that other he was bound at his peril to find out whether the other was acting under his permission, to see that he was warned, and, if necessary, stopped.

I have been speaking about the study of the law, and I have said next to nothing of what commonly is talked about in that connection, — text-books and the case system, and all the machinery with which a student comes most immediately in contact. Nor shall I say anything about them Theory is my subject, not practical details. The modes of teaching have been improved since my time, no doubt, but ability and industry will master the raw material with any mode. Theory is the most important part of the dogma of the law, as the architect is the most important man who takes part in the building of a house. The most important improvements of the last twenty-five years are improvements in theory. It is not to be feared as unpractical, for, to the competent, it simply means going to the bottom of the subject. For the incompetent, it sometimes is true, as has been said, that an interest in general ideas means an absence of particular knowledge. I remember in army days reading of a youth who, being examined for the lowest grade and being asked a question about squadron drill, answered that he never had considered the evolutions of less than ten thousand men. But the weak and foolish must be left to their folly. The danger is that the able and practical minded should look with indifference or distrust upon ideas the connection of which with their business is remote. I heard a story, the other day, of a man who had a valet to whom he paid high wages, subject to deduction for faults. One of his deductions was, "For lack of imagination, five dollars." The lack is not confined to valets. The object of ambition, power, generally presents itself nowadays in the form of money alone. Money is the most immediate form, and is a proper object of desire. "The fortune," said Rachel, "is the measure of the intelligence." That is a good text to waken people out of a fool's paradise. But, as Hegel says,[1] "It is in the end not the appetite, but the opinion, which has to be satisfied." To an imagination of any scope the most far-reaching form of power is not money, it is the command of ideas. If you want great examples read Mr. Leslie Stephen's "History of English Thought in the Eighteenth Century," and see how a hundred years after his death the abstract speculations of Descartes had become a practical force controlling the conduct of men. Read the works of the great German jurists, and see how much more the world is governed to-day by Kant than by Bonaparte. We cannot all be Descartes or Kant, but we all want happiness. And happiness, I am sure from having known many successful men, cannot be won simply by being counsel for great corporations and having an income of fifty thousand dollars. An intellect great enough to win the prize needs other food beside success. The remoter and more general aspects of the law are those which give it universal interest. It is through them that you not only become a great master in your calling, but connect your subject with the universe and catch an echo of the infinite, a glimpse of its unfathomable process, a hint of the universal law.

Federalist No. 83:
The Judiciary Continued in Relation to Trial by Jury

From McLean's Edition, New York

Alexander Hamilton
May 28, 1788

To the People of the State of New York:

THE objection to the plan of the convention, which has met with most success in this State, and perhaps in several of the other States, is THAT RELATIVE TO THE WANT OF A CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISION for the trial by jury in civil cases. The disingenuous form in which this objection is usually stated has been repeatedly adverted to and exposed, but continues to be pursued in all the conversations and writings of the opponents of the plan. The mere silence of the Constitution in regard to CIVIL CAUSES, is represented as an abolition of the trial by jury, and the declamations to which it has afforded a pretext are artfully calculated to induce a persuasion that this pretended abolition is complete and universal, extending not only to every species of civil, but even to CRIMINAL CAUSES. To argue with respect to the latter would, however, be as vain and fruitless as to attempt the serious proof of the EXISTENCE of MATTER, or to demonstrate any of those propositions which, by their own internal evidence, force conviction, when expressed in language adapted to convey their meaning.

With regard to civil causes, subtleties almost too contemptible for refutation have been employed to countenance the surmise that a thing which is only NOT PROVIDED FOR, is entirely ABOLISHED. Every man of discernment must at once perceive the wide difference between SILENCE and ABOLITION. But as the inventors of this fallacy have attempted to support it by certain LEGAL MAXIMS of interpretation, which they have perverted from their true meaning, it may not be wholly useless to explore the ground they have taken.

The maxims on which they rely are of this nature: ``A specification of particulars is an exclusion of generals"; or, ``The expression of one thing is the exclusion of another." Hence, say they, as the Constitution has established the trial by jury in criminal cases, and is silent in respect to civil, this silence is an implied prohibition of trial by jury in regard to the latter.

The rules of legal interpretation are rules of COMMONSENSE, adopted by the courts in the construction of the laws. The true test, therefore, of a just application of them is its conformity to the source from which they are derived. This being the case, let me ask if it is consistent with common-sense to suppose that a provision obliging the legislative power to commit the trial of criminal causes to juries, is a privation of its right to authorize or permit that mode of trial in other cases? Is it natural to suppose, that a command to do one thing is a prohibition to the doing of another, which there was a previous power to do, and which is not incompatible with the thing commanded to be done? If such a supposition would be unnatural and unreasonable, it cannot be rational to maintain that an injunction of the trial by jury in certain cases is an interdiction of it in others.

A power to constitute courts is a power to prescribe the mode of trial; and consequently, if nothing was said in the Constitution on the subject of juries, the legislature would be at liberty either to adopt that institution or to let it alone. This discretion, in regard to criminal causes, is abridged by the express injunction of trial by jury in all such cases; but it is, of course, left at large in relation to civil causes, there being a total silence on this head. The specification of an obligation to try all criminal causes in a particular mode, excludes indeed the obligation or necessity of employing the same mode in civil causes, but does not abridge THE POWER of the legislature to exercise that mode if it should be thought proper. The pretense, therefore, that the national legislature would not be at full liberty to submit all the civil causes of federal cognizance to the determination of juries, is a pretense destitute of all just foundation.

From these observations this conclusion results: that the trial by jury in civil cases would not be abolished; and that the use attempted to be made of the maxims which have been quoted, is contrary to reason and common-sense, and therefore not admissible. Even if these maxims had a precise technical sense, corresponding with the idea of those who employ them upon the present occasion, which, however, is not the case, they would still be inapplicable to a constitution of government. In relation to such a subject, the natural and obvious sense of its provisions, apart from any technical rules, is the true criterion of construction.

Having now seen that the maxims relied upon will not bear the use made of them, let us endeavor to ascertain their proper use and true meaning. This will be best done by examples. The plan of the convention declares that the power of Congress, or, in other words, of the NATIONAL LEGISLATURE, shall extend to certain enumerated cases. This specification of particulars evidently excludes all pretension to a general legislative authority, because an affirmative grant of special powers would be absurd, as well as useless, if a general authority was intended.

In like manner the judicial authority of the federal judicatures is declared by the Constitution to comprehend certain cases particularly specified. The expression of those cases marks the precise limits, beyond which the federal courts cannot extend their jurisdiction, because the objects of their cognizance being enumerated, the specification would be nugatory if it did not exclude all ideas of more extensive authority.

These examples are sufficient to elucidate the maxims which have been mentioned, and to designate the manner in which they should be used. But that there may be no misapprehensions upon this subject, I shall add one case more, to demonstrate the proper use of these maxims, and the abuse which has been made of them.

Let us suppose that by the laws of this State a married woman was incapable of conveying her estate, and that the legislature, considering this as an evil, should enact that she might dispose of her property by deed executed in the presence of a magistrate. In such a case there can be no doubt but the specification would amount to an exclusion of any other mode of conveyance, because the woman having no previous power to alienate her property, the specification determines the particular mode which she is, for that purpose, to avail herself of. But let us further suppose that in a subsequent part of the same act it should be declared that no woman should dispose of any estate of a determinate value without the consent of three of her nearest relations, signified by their signing the deed; could it be inferred from this regulation that a married woman might not procure the approbation of her relations to a deed for conveying property of inferior value? The position is too absurd to merit a refutation, and yet this is precisely the position which those must establish who contend that the trial by juries in civil cases is abolished, because it is expressly provided for in cases of a criminal nature.

From these observations it must appear unquestionably true, that trial by jury is in no case abolished by the proposed Constitution, and it is equally true, that in those controversies between individuals in which the great body of the people are likely to be interested, that institution will remain precisely in the same situation in which it is placed by the State constitutions, and will be in no degree altered or influenced by the adoption of the plan under consideration. The foundation of this assertion is, that the national judiciary will have no cognizance of them, and of course they will remain determinable as heretofore by the State courts only, and in the manner which the State constitutions and laws prescribe. All land causes, except where claims under the grants of different States come into question, and all other controversies between the citizens of the same State, unless where they depend upon positive violations of the articles of union, by acts of the State legislatures, will belong exclusively to the jurisdiction of the State tribunals. Add to this, that admiralty causes, and almost all those which are of equity jurisdiction, are determinable under our own government without the intervention of a jury, and the inference from the whole will be, that this institution, as it exists with us at present, cannot possibly be affected to any great extent by the proposed alteration in our system of government.

The friends and adversaries of the plan of the convention, if they agree in nothing else, concur at least in the value they set upon the trial by jury; or if there is any difference between them it consists in this: the former regard it as a valuable safeguard to liberty; the latter represent it as the very palladium of free government. For my own part, the more the operation of the institution has fallen under my observation, the more reason I have discovered for holding it in high estimation; and it would be altogether superfluous to examine to what extent it deserves to be esteemed useful or essential in a representative republic, or how much more merit it may be entitled to, as a defense against the oppressions of an hereditary monarch, than as a barrier to the tyranny of popular magistrates in a popular government. Discussions of this kind would be more curious than beneficial, as all are satisfied of the utility of the institution, and of its friendly aspect to liberty. But I must acknowledge that I cannot readily discern the inseparable connection between the existence of liberty, and the trial by jury in civil cases. Arbitrary impeachments, arbitrary methods of prosecuting pretended offenses, and arbitrary punishments upon arbitrary convictions, have ever appeared to me to be the great engines of judicial despotism; and these have all relation to criminal proceedings. The trial by jury in criminal cases, aided by the habeas-corpus act, seems therefore to be alone concerned in the question. And both of these are provided for, in the most ample manner, in the plan of the convention.

It has been observed, that trial by jury is a safeguard against an oppressive exercise of the power of taxation. This observation deserves to be canvassed.

It is evident that it can have no influence upon the legislature, in regard to the AMOUNT of taxes to be laid, to the OBJECTS upon which they are to be imposed, or to the RULE by which they are to be apportioned. If it can have any influence, therefore, it must be upon the mode of collection, and the conduct of the officers intrusted with the execution of the revenue laws.

As to the mode of collection in this State, under our own Constitution, the trial by jury is in most cases out of use. The taxes are usually levied by the more summary proceeding of distress and sale, as in cases of rent. And it is acknowledged on all hands, that this is essential to the efficacy of the revenue laws. The dilatory course of a trial at law to recover the taxes imposed on individuals, would neither suit the exigencies of the public nor promote the convenience of the citizens. It would often occasion an accumulation of costs, more burdensome than the original sum of the tax to be levied.

And as to the conduct of the officers of the revenue, the provision in favor of trial by jury in criminal cases, will afford the security aimed at. Wilful abuses of a public authority, to the oppression of the subject, and every species of official extortion, are offenses against the government, for which the persons who commit them may be indicted and punished according to the circumstances of the case.

The excellence of the trial by jury in civil cases appears to depend on circumstances foreign to the preservation of liberty. The strongest argument in its favor is, that it is a security against corruption. As there is always more time and better opportunity to tamper with a standing body of magistrates than with a jury summoned for the occasion, there is room to suppose that a corrupt influence would more easily find its way to the former than to the latter. The force of this consideration is, however, diminished by others. The sheriff, who is the summoner of ordinary juries, and the clerks of courts, who have the nomination of special juries, are themselves standing officers, and, acting individually, may be supposed more accessible to the touch of corruption than the judges, who are a collective body. It is not difficult to see, that it would be in the power of those officers to select jurors who would serve the purpose of the party as well as a corrupted bench. In the next place, it may fairly be supposed, that there would be less difficulty in gaining some of the jurors promiscuously taken from the public mass, than in gaining men who had been chosen by the government for their probity and good character. But making every deduction for these considerations, the trial by jury must still be a valuable check upon corruption. It greatly multiplies the impediments to its success. As matters now stand, it would be necessary to corrupt both court and jury; for where the jury have gone evidently wrong, the court will generally grant a new trial, and it would be in most cases of little use to practice upon the jury, unless the court could be likewise gained. Here then is a double security; and it will readily be perceived that this complicated agency tends to preserve the purity of both institutions. By increasing the obstacles to success, it discourages attempts to seduce the integrity of either. The temptations to prostitution which the judges might have to surmount, must certainly be much fewer, while the co-operation of a jury is necessary, than they might be, if they had themselves the exclusive determination of all causes.

Notwithstanding, therefore, the doubts I have expressed, as to the essentiality of trial by jury in civil cases to liberty, I admit that it is in most cases, under proper regulations, an excellent method of determining questions of property; and that on this account alone it would be entitled to a constitutional provision in its favor if it were possible to fix the limits within which it ought to be comprehended. There is, however, in all cases, great difficulty in this; and men not blinded by enthusiasm must be sensible that in a federal government, which is a composition of societies whose ideas and institutions in relation to the matter materially vary from each other, that difficulty must be not a little augmented. For my own part, at every new view I take of the subject, I become more convinced of the reality of the obstacles which, we are authoritatively informed, prevented the insertion of a provision on this head in the plan of the convention.

The great difference between the limits of the jury trial in different States is not generally understood; and as it must have considerable influence on the sentence we ought to pass upon the omission complained of in regard to this point, an explanation of it is necessary. In this State, our judicial establishments resemble, more nearly than in any other, those of Great Britain. We have courts of common law, courts of probates (analogous in certain matters to the spiritual courts in England), a court of admiralty and a court of chancery. In the courts of common law only, the trial by jury prevails, and this with some exceptions. In all the others a single judge presides, and proceeds in general either according to the course of the canon or civil law, without the aid of a jury. [1] In New Jersey, there is a court of chancery which proceeds like ours, but neither courts of admiralty nor of probates, in the sense in which these last are established with us. In that State the courts of common law have the cognizance of those causes which with us are determinable in the courts of admiralty and of probates, and of course the jury trial is more extensive in New Jersey than in New York. In Pennsylvania, this is perhaps still more the case, for there is no court of chancery in that State, and its common-law courts have equity jurisdiction. It has a court of admiralty, but none of probates, at least on the plan of ours. Delaware has in these respects imitated Pennsylvania. Maryland approaches more nearly to New York, as does also Virginia, except that the latter has a plurality of chancellors. North Carolina bears most affinity to Pennsylvania; South Carolina to Virginia. I believe, however, that in some of those States which have distinct courts of admiralty, the causes depending in them are triable by juries. In Georgia there are none but common-law courts, and an appeal of course lies from the verdict of one jury to another, which is called a special jury, and for which a particular mode of appointment is marked out. In Connecticut, they have no distinct courts either of chancery or of admiralty, and their courts of probates have no jurisdiction of causes. Their common-law courts have admiralty and, to a certain extent, equity jurisdiction. In cases of importance, their

General Assembly is the only court of chancery. In Connecticut, therefore, the trial by jury extends in PRACTICE further than in any other State yet mentioned. Rhode Island is, I believe, in this particular, pretty much in the situation of Connecticut. Massachusetts and New Hampshire, in regard to the blending of law, equity, and admiralty jurisdictions, are in a similar predicament. In the four Eastern States, the trial by jury not only stands upon a broader foundation than in the other States, but it is attended with a peculiarity unknown, in its full extent, to any of them. There is an appeal OF COURSE from one jury to another, till there have been two verdicts out of three on one side.

From this sketch it appears that there is a material diversity, as well in the modification as in the extent of the institution of trial by jury in civil cases, in the several States; and from this fact these obvious reflections flow: first, that no general rule could have been fixed upon by the convention which would have corresponded with the circumstances of all the States; and secondly, that more or at least as much might have been hazarded by taking the system of any one State for a standard, as by omitting a provision altogether and leaving the matter, as has been done, to legislative regulation.

The propositions which have been made for supplying the omission have rather served to illustrate than to obviate the difficulty of the thing. The minority of Pennsylvania have proposed this mode of expression for the purpose ``Trial by jury shall be as heretofore" and this I maintain would be senseless and nugatory. The United States, in their united or collective capacity, are the OBJECT to which all general provisions in the Constitution must necessarily be construed to refer. Now it is evident that though trial by jury, with various limitations, is known in each State individually, yet in the United States, AS SUCH, it is at this time altogether unknown, because the present federal government has no judiciary power whatever; and consequently there is no proper antecedent or previous establishment to which the term HERETOFORE could relate. It would therefore be destitute of a precise meaning, and inoperative from its uncertainty.

As, on the one hand, the form of the provision would not fulfil the intent of its proposers, so, on the other, if I apprehend that intent rightly, it would be in itself inexpedient. I presume it to be, that causes in the federal courts should be tried by jury, if, in the State where the courts sat, that mode of trial would obtain in a similar case in the State courts; that is to say, admiralty causes should be tried in Connecticut by a jury, in New York without one. The capricious operation of so dissimilar a method of trial in the same cases, under the same government, is of itself sufficient to indispose every well regulated judgment towards it. Whether the cause should be tried with or without a jury, would depend, in a great number of cases, on the accidental situation of the court and parties.

But this is not, in my estimation, the greatest objection. I feel a deep and deliberate conviction that there are many cases in which the trial by jury is an ineligible one. I think it so particularly in cases which concern the public peace with foreign nations that is, in most cases where the question turns wholly on the laws of nations. Of this nature, among others, are all prize causes. Juries cannot be supposed competent to investigations that require a thorough knowledge of the laws and usages of nations; and they will sometimes be under the influence of impressions which will not suffer them to pay sufficient regard to those considerations of public policy which ought to guide their inquiries. There would of course be always danger that the rights of other nations might be infringed by their decisions, so as to afford occasions of reprisal and war. Though the proper province of juries be to determine matters of fact, yet in most cases legal consequences are complicated with fact in such a manner as to render a separation impracticable.

It will add great weight to this remark, in relation to prize causes, to mention that the method of determining them has been thought worthy of particular regulation in various treaties between different powers of Europe, and that, pursuant to such treaties, they are determinable in Great Britain, in the last resort, before the king himself, in his privy council, where the fact, as well as the law, undergoes a re-examination. This alone demonstrates the impolicy of inserting a fundamental provision in the Constitution which would make the State systems a standard for the national government in the article under consideration, and the danger of encumbering the government with any constitutional provisions the propriety of which is not indisputable.

My convictions are equally strong that great advantages result from the separation of the equity from the law jurisdiction, and that the causes which belong to the former would be improperly committed to juries. The great and primary use of a court of equity is to give relief IN EXTRAORDINARY CASES, which are EXCEPTIONS [2] to general rules. To unite the jurisdiction of such cases with the ordinary jurisdiction, must have a tendency to unsettle the general rules, and to subject every case that arises to a SPECIAL determination; while a separation of the one from the other has the contrary effect of rendering one a sentinel over the other, and of keeping each within the expedient limits. Besides this, the circumstances that constitute cases proper for courts of equity are in many instances so nice and intricate, that they are incompatible with the genius of trials by jury. They require often such long, deliberate, and critical investigation as would be impracticable to men called from their occupations, and obliged to decide before they were permitted to return to them. The simplicity and expedition which form the distinguishing characters of this mode of trial require that the matter to be decided should be reduced to some single and obvious point; while the litigations usual in chancery frequently comprehend a long train of minute and independent particulars.

It is true that the separation of the equity from the legal jurisdiction is peculiar to the English system of jurisprudence: which is the model that has been followed in several of the States. But it is equally true that the trial by jury has been unknown in every case in which they have been united. And the separation is essential to the preservation of that institution in its pristine purity. The nature of a court of equity will readily permit the extension of its jurisdiction to matters of law; but it is not a little to be suspected, that the attempt to extend the jurisdiction of the courts of law to matters of equity will not only be unproductive of the advantages which may be derived from courts of chancery, on the plan upon which they are established in this State, but will tend gradually to change the nature of the courts of law, and to undermine the trial by jury, by introducing questions too complicated for a decision in that mode.

These appeared to be conclusive reasons against incorporating the systems of all the States, in the formation of the national judiciary, according to what may be conjectured to have been the attempt of the Pennsylvania minority. Let us now examine how far the proposition of Massachusetts is calculated to remedy the supposed defect.

It is in this form: ``In civil actions between citizens of different States, every issue of fact, arising in ACTIONS AT COMMON LAW, may be tried by a jury if the parties, or either of them request it."

This, at best, is a proposition confined to one description of causes; and the inference is fair, either that the Massachusetts convention considered that as the only class of federal causes, in which the trial by jury would be proper; or that if desirous of a more extensive provision, they found it impracticable to devise one which would properly answer the end. If the first, the omission of a regulation respecting so partial an object can never be considered as a material imperfection in the system. If the last, it affords a strong corroboration of the extreme difficulty of the thing.

But this is not all: if we advert to the observations already made respecting the courts that subsist in the several States of the Union, and the different powers exercised by them, it will appear that there are no expressions more vague and indeterminate than those which have been employed to characterize THAT species of causes which it is intended shall be entitled to a trial by jury. In this State, the boundaries between actions at common law and actions of equitable jurisdiction, are ascertained in conformity to the rules which prevail in England upon that subject. In many of the other States the boundaries are less precise. In some of them every cause is to be tried in a court of common law, and upon that foundation every action may be considered as an action at common law, to be determined by a jury, if the parties, or either of them, choose it. Hence the same irregularity and confusion would be introduced by a compliance with this proposition, that I have already noticed as resulting from the regulation proposed by the Pennsylvania minority. In one State a cause would receive its determination from a jury, if the parties, or either of them, requested it; but in another State, a cause exactly similar to the other, must be decided without the intervention of a jury, because the State judicatories varied as to common-law jurisdiction.

It is obvious, therefore, that the Massachusetts proposition, upon this subject cannot operate as a general regulation, until some uniform plan, with respect to the limits of common-law and equitable jurisdictions, shall be adopted by the different States. To devise a plan of that kind is a task arduous in itself, and which it would require much time and reflection to mature. It would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to suggest any general regulation that would be acceptable to all the States in the Union, or that would perfectly quadrate with the several State institutions.

It may be asked, Why could not a reference have been made to the constitution of this State, taking that, which is allowed by me to be a good one, as a standard for the United States? I answer that it is not very probable the other States would entertain the same opinion of our institutions as we do ourselves. It is natural to suppose that they are hitherto more attached to their own, and that each would struggle for the preference. If the plan of taking one State as a model for the whole had been thought of in the convention, it is to be presumed that the adoption of it in that body would have been rendered difficult by the predilection of each representation in favor of its own government; and it must be uncertain which of the States would have been taken as the model. It has been shown that many of them would be improper ones. And I leave it to conjecture, whether, under all circumstances, it is most likely that New York, or some other State, would have been preferred. But admit that a judicious selection could have been effected in the convention, still there would have been great danger of jealousy and disgust in the other States, at the partiality which had been shown to the institutions of one. The enemies of the plan would have been furnished with a fine pretext for raising a host of local prejudices against it, which perhaps might have hazarded, in no inconsiderable degree, its final establishment.

To avoid the embarrassments of a definition of the cases which the trial by jury ought to embrace, it is sometimes suggested by men of enthusiastic tempers, that a provision might have been inserted for establishing it in all cases whatsoever. For this I believe, no precedent is to be found in any member of the Union; and the considerations which have been stated in discussing the proposition of the minority of Pennsylvania, must satisfy every sober mind that the establishment of the trial by jury in ALL cases would have been an unpardonable error in the plan.

In short, the more it is considered the more arduous will appear the task of fashioning a provision in such a form as not to express too little to answer the purpose, or too much to be advisable; or which might not have opened other sources of opposition to the great and essential object of introducing a firm national government.

I cannot but persuade myself, on the other hand, that the different lights in which the subject has been placed in the course of these observations, will go far towards removing in candid minds the apprehensions they may have entertained on the point. They have tended to show that the security of liberty is materially concerned only in the trial by jury in criminal cases, which is provided for in the most ample manner in the plan of the convention; that even in far the greatest proportion of civil cases, and those in which the great body of the community is interested, that mode of trial will remain in its full force, as established in the State constitutions, untouched and unaffected by the plan of the convention; that it is in no case abolished [3] by that plan; and that there are great if not insurmountable difficulties in the way of making any precise and proper provision for it in a Constitution for the United States.

The best judges of the matter will be the least anxious for a constitutional establishment of the trial by jury in civil cases, and will be the most ready to admit that the changes which are continually happening in the affairs of society may render a different mode of determining questions of property preferable in many cases in which that mode of trial now prevails. For my part, I acknowledge myself to be convinced that even in this State it might be advantageously extended to some cases to which it does not at present apply, and might as advantageously be abridged in others. It is conceded by all reasonable men that it ought not to obtain in all cases. The examples of innovations which contract its ancient limits, as well in these States as in Great Britain, afford a strong presumption that its former extent has been found inconvenient, and give room to suppose that future experience may discover the propriety and utility of other exceptions. I suspect it to be impossible in the nature of the thing to fix the salutary point at which the operation of the institution ought to stop, and this is with me a strong argument for leaving the matter to the discretion of the legislature.

This is now clearly understood to be the case in Great Britain, and it is equally so in the State of Connecticut; and yet it may be safely affirmed that more numerous encroachments have been made upon the trial by jury in this State since the Revolution, though provided for by a positive article of our constitution, than has happened in the same time either in Connecticut or Great Britain. It may be added that these encroachments have generally originated with the men who endeavor to persuade the people they are the warmest defenders of popular liberty, but who have rarely suffered constitutional obstacles to arrest them in a favorite career. The truth is that the general GENIUS of a government is all that can be substantially relied upon for permanent effects. Particular provisions, though not altogether useless, have far less virtue and efficacy than are commonly ascribed to them; and the want of them will never be, with men of sound discernment, a decisive objection to any plan which exhibits the leading characters of a good government.

It certainly sounds not a little harsh and extraordinary to affirm that there is no security for liberty in a Constitution which expressly establishes the trial by jury in criminal cases, because it does not do it in civil also; while it is a notorious fact that Connecticut, which has been always regarded as the most popular State in the Union, can boast of no constitutional provision for either.

PUBLIUS.

1. It has been erroneously insinuated, with regard to the court of chancery, that this court generally tries disputed facts by a jury. The truth is, that references to a jury in that court rarely happen, and are in no case necessary but where the validity of a devise of land comes into question.

2. It is true that the principles by which that relief is governed are now reduced to a regular system; but it is not the less true that they are in the main applicable to SPECIAL circumstances, which form exceptions to general rules.

3. Vide No. 81, in which the supposition of its being abolished by the appellate jurisdiction in matters of fact being vested in the Supreme Court, is examined and refuted.

LAW AND ITS DISCONTENTS: A CRITICAL LOOK AT OUR LEGAL SYSTEM

by DEREK BOK*
President, Harvard University

The thirty-seventh Benjamin N. Cardozo Lecture was delivered at the House of the Association on November 9, 1982.

I am honored but also somewhat puzzled to have been asked to join the long line of Cardozo lecturers. Looking back over the roster of previous speakers, I see the names of eminent judges, scholars, and practitioners. What I do not find are fellow fugitives from the profession, persons like myself who have not taught a class, authored a law review article, or argued a case for more than a decade. Now why—I asked myself—would the leaders of your association wish to expose the membership to the views of so unlikely a speaker? And suddenly, the answer came to me. You probably consider me rather like an astronaut who has disappeared into the void on some exotic journey, leaving the world of law far behind. As you carry on, happily immersed in your legal careers, some of you must have thought that it would be amusing to contact me and ask how your planet looks from such a great distance.

If this is the case, I must take full advantage of the odd situation in which I find myself. None of us will profit if I talk about the details of the world you inhabit: the subtle shifts in Supreme Court opinions, the efforts to devise a new code of ethics for the bar, the competing views on merger guidelines, or the puzzling dilemma of the insanity defense. My perspective must be a global one, emphasizing broad contours of a legal world only distantly perceived. And if I dare make generalizations, let alone offer prescriptions, my views should reflect my role as an educator, with opportunities to compare the needs and problems of several different professions.

A FLAWED SYSTEM

Looking over these professions, I think I know where to place the law and where to look for useful analogies. Our legal system reminds me of our health care system twenty years ago. At that time, the medical care offered to paying patients was rapidly becoming more complex, more sophisticated—and more expensive as well. But quality medicine was available only to the well-to-do or to those who happened to be covered by an adequate prepaid plan. Millions of people with modest incomes could not afford decent care; they visited doctors much less often and their mortality rates were distinctly higher.

From my distant perch, our legal system seems in much the same position today. As in medicine, there is much in our law that represents a triumph of the human spirit: the steadfast defense of individual freedom and civil liberties, the constant elevation of reason over prejudice and passion, the protections afforded to minority and disadvantaged groups. But there are other similarities of a darker kind. The laws that govern affluent clients and large institutions are numerous, intricate, and applied by highly sophisticated practitioners. In this sector of society, rules proliferate, law suits abound, and the cost of legal services grows much faster than the cost of living. For the bulk of the population, however, the situation is very different. Access to the courts may be open in principle. In practice, however, most people find their legal rights severely compromised by the cost of legal services, the baffling complications of existing rules and procedures, and the long, frustrating delays involved in bringing proceedings to a conclusion. From afar, therefore, the legal system looks grossly inequitable and inefficient. There is far too much law for those who can afford it and far too little for those who cannot. No one can be satisfied with this state of affairs.

If medicine faced a similar predicament at least two decades ago, what can we learn from its experience? Alas, not much. To be sure, Congress was reasonably successful in giving access to the needy. By enacting programs like Medicare and Medicaid, it did offer poor and elderly people the chance to enjoy quality care. But our legislators chose to reach their goal by simply shifting the burden of medical services from the sick to the taxpayer so that neither doctor nor patient had an incentive to keep costs down. Since quality care was expensive, the result was a massive rise in health costs. To curb these increases, lawmakers resorted to regulations to slow hospital construction and moderate the rise in room rates. But this strategy failed because the regulators never fully understood the problem and never succeeded in gaining the cooperation of doctors. Health care costs continued to rise more rapidly than the cost of living and now consume almost 10 percent of our gross national product—a larger share than in any other industrialized country of the world.

With this example before us, we should think hard about the problems of our legal system to avoid making similar mistakes. In this spirit, let us examine our problems and try to understand them clearly.

One half of our difficulty lies in the burdens and costs of our tangle of laws and legal procedures. Contrary to popular belief, the volume of litigated court cases per thousand people has probably not been rising rapidly, and the time required to process cases may have even declined, on the whole, over the past twenty years. Nevertheless, the complexity of litigation seems to be increasing. Moreover, the nation has experienced a marked growth of administrative regulation; the number of federal agencies jumped from twenty to seventy in the last two decades while the pages of federal regulations tripled in the 1970s alone. Paralleling these trends, the number of lawyers has risen by more than 50 percent since 1960 so that the United States now boasts the largest number of attorneys per thousand population of any major industrialized nation—three times as many as in Germany, ten times the number in Sweden, and a whopping twenty times the figure in Japan. In sum, there is more legal work to do and many more attorneys to do it. Just what society pays for this profusion of law is hard to guess. Lloyd Cutler has put the figure at $30 billion a year,[1] but the truth is that no one has bothered to find out. Be that as it may, legal costs are primarily people costs, and if we mark the growth in the total number of lawyers and the average compensation of attorneys, it is clear that legal expenditures have been climbing more rapidly than the gross national product for many years.

But is it wrong to spend so much on legal services? After all, people pay a lot for underarm deodorants, television soap operas, liquor and drugs. If rules are passed by elected representatives and legal expenses are voluntarily incurred, is it clear that the nation is spending "too much"—on law?

The catch in this argument, of course, is the quiet assumption that rules and regulations are all freely chosen through something akin to a market process. In fact, that is far from being the case. Many rules are the work of judges or bureaucrats over whom the general public has little control. Most of our statutes and administrative regulations have been complicated by the efforts of pressure groups and lobbyists. If the general outlines of our laws are supported by the public, their details and complexities are hardly understood, let alone endorsed, by the average voter. Even rules that were widely approved when enacted often prove unexpectedly cumbersome and ineffective, yet efforts at reform quickly die from inertia or from the opposition of vested interests.

No, we cannot comfort ourselves by supposing that laws and legal services are freely chosen by the public like breakfast cereals and automobiles. Nor do most laws seem to offer effective or efficient means of achieving the public good. Consider the two subjects that I know best: labor law and antitrust. After a dozen years of teaching, I would assert that large areas of the law in each of these fields rest so heavily on sheer guesswork that no one can be confident that our rules actually serve the public interest.

In antitrust, I would not go so far as to endorse the view, now fashionable among economists, that our laws seriously harm the economy. I do question whether many of the legal marathons and treble damage suits that clutter the field are truly worth the money and time they cost. To test this judgment, I recently approached an old acquaintance—one of the country's leading antitrust experts—and asked him whether he would dispute my claim—that over half of all antitrust decisions have no demonstrable effect in furthering accepted economic goals. Instead of chiding me for speaking rashly, my colleague replied that he would push the figure up to at least 75 percent.

In labor law, more than half the work of the National Labor Relations Board is devoted to defining the proper employee unit in which to hold elections and enforcing an intricate body of rules governing the electioneering behavior of unions and employers. Most unit determinations are fine-grained applications of assumptions so arbitrary that no one can be sure that a decision furthers the public interest. One can argue that these decisions cause little harm. But they do cost money and absorb large quantities of time and energy. At Harvard, for example, over a year of effort and several hundred thousand dollars were consumed in trying to decide whether to hold an election among the clerical workers in the entire University or only among those working in the Medical School. Even a rich country cannot afford to spend such sums on issues of this kind.

As for the electioneering rules, studies have shown that many of the Board's regulations have little or no effect on the voting behavior of employees or on the outcome of the elections themselves.[2] Much the same is true of other aspects of our labor laws. For example, numerous studies have found no reduction in accident rates resulting from the mass of regulations on work-place safety.[3] And yet, the law grinds on in an unceasing effort to build a consistent body of rules from what are often unproven or unrealistic premises.

[2] GETMAN, GOLDBERG AND HERMAN, UNION REPRESENTATION ELECTIONS: LAW AND REALITY (1976).

A further cost of our cumbersome legal system is its inhibiting effect on entrepreneurship, creativity, and progress. Foreign businessmen express amazement at a system that relies so heavily on lawsuits rather than negotiation to settle business differences, a system that exposes the entrepreneur to legal challenge so easily and on so many different fronts, a system that lends itself so readily to harassment, obstruction, and delay.

If these observations are even half true, our legal system leads to much waste of money that could be put to more profitable uses. But even greater costs result from the diversion of exceptionally talented people into legal pursuits that often add little to the growth of the economy or the pursuit of culture or the enhancement of the human spirit. I cannot make this point too strongly. As I travel around the country looking at different professions and institutions, I am constantly struck by how complicated many jobs have become, how difficult many institutions are to administer, how pressing are the demands for more creativity and intelligence. However aggressive our educational system may be in searching out able youths and giving them a good education, the supply of exceptional people is limited. Yet far too many of these rare individuals are becoming lawyers at a time when the country cries out for more talented business executives, more enlightened public servants, more inventive engineers, more effective high school principals.

These points may seem carping or conjectural, but they are not without tangible effects. A nation's values and problems are mirrored in the ways in which it uses its ablest people. In Japan, a country only half our size, 30 percent more engineers graduate each year than in all the United States. But Japan boasts a total of less than 15,000 lawyers, while American universities graduate 35,000 every year. It would be hard to claim that these differences have no practical consequences. As the Japanese put it, "engineers make the pie grow larger; lawyers only decide how to carve it up."

The cumbersomeness of our laws and procedures does much to explain the other problem of the legal system—the lack of access for the poor and middle class. The results are embarrassing to behold. Criminal defendants are herded through the courts at a speed that precludes individual attention, leaving countless accused to the mercy of inexperienced counsel who negotiate their fate in hasty plea bargaining with the prosecution. On the civil side, the cost of hiring a lawyer and the mysteries of the legal process discourage most people of modest means from trying to enforce their rights. Every study of common forms of litigation, such as medical malpractice, tenant evictions, or debt collections, reveals that for each successful suit there are several others that could be won if the victims had the money and the will to secure a lawyer.

Congress has tried to address this problem by creating the Legal Services Corporation. But even in its palmiest days, the Corporation was only empowered to help the poor and had money enough to address but a small fraction of the claims of even this limited constituency. Since then, its budget has been cut severely. Middle-income plaintiffs often find that legal expenses eat up most of the amounts that they recover. In personal injury claims, contingent fees may help to overcome the cost barrier, but legal expenses consume a third or more of the average settlement in most proceedings and can often rise to 50 percent in cases going to trial. As many observers have testified, the costs and delays of our system force countless victims to accept inadequate settlements or to give up any attempt to vindicate their legal rights.

This state of affairs has become so familiar that it evokes little concern from most of those who spend their lives in the profession. As I travel around the country, however, and talk to laymen in other walks of life, these problems loom so large as virtually to blot out every other feature of the legal system. The blunt, inexcusable fact is that this nation, which prides itself on efficiency and justice, has developed a legal system that is the most expensive in the world yet cannot manage to protect the rights of most of its citizens.

THE ROOTS OF OUR PREDICAMENT

How did this situation come about? The typical response is to lay most of the blame on legislators and public officials for enacting far too many rules while refusing to appropriate enough money for legal aid. There is much to be said for this view. But it is far from the whole truth. Even a brief glance at the record will show plenty of examples in which the cost of litigation and the volume of legal activity continue to rise although the legislature is inactive. In my own field of labor law, for example, the case load of the National Labor Relations Board has quadrupled over the last 30 years even though there have been no major new statutes and no growth at all in the size of the union movement. In largely common law fields, such as personal injury litigation, legal costs have grown steadily, often without new legislation, so that they now eat up more than half of the typical insurance premium.

All things considered, our difficulties would not end even if legislators stopped producing new rules and appropriated enough money to allow all poor and middle-class people to hire competent lawyers. In fact, the problems would probably grow much worse. Judges and other adjudicators would continue to create new precedents and rules. Moreover, beneath the visible mass of litigation lies a vast accumulation of festering quarrels and potential suits that never come to court because of fear, ignorance, and the inhibiting cost of legal services. If Congress provided enough funds for legal aid, or followed the suggestion of an earlier speaker in this series and paid as much to legal defenders as we pay to the prosecution,[4] it could easily touch off a burst of litigation that would cost huge sums of money and add heavily to the burdens and delays of the legal system.

The roots of our predicament, then, are more complex than popular impressions would allow. Many factors contribute to the volume of disputes and the intricacies of legal rules. Industrialization and technology produce new forms of conflict and injury; new knowledge extends our understanding of causation and points to novel theories of liability; fresh government initiatives create new interests and limit private activity in ways that lead to legal controversy. Amid these contributing factors, however, one thread runs particularly vividly. At bottom, ours is a society built on individualism, competition, and success. These values bring great personal freedom and mobilize powerful energies. At the same time, they carry strong tendencies to shoulder aside one's competitors, to cut corners, to ignore the interests of others in the struggle to succeed. In such a world, much responsibility rests on those who umpire the contest. Whenever our standards of fairness and decency rise, the rules of the game tend to multiply and the umpire's burden grows heavier and heavier.

These tendencies are especially clear in an era such as the present. For at least twenty years, we have witnessed the steady growth of new interests aggressively pursued by blacks, women, older citizens, homosexuals, environmentalists, consumer activists, and many more. In struggling to protect their interests, these groups have argued their case by exposing widespread injustice, neglect, and bias in the society. In forcing the public to look upon these problems, they have lowered the level of trust in government and lessened confidence in established institutions and have thereby paved the way for new legal safeguards to check authority and prevent its abuse.

Faced with these pressures, judges and legislators have responded in ways that reflect our distinctive legal traditions. One hallmark of that tradition is a steadfast faith in intricate procedures where evidence and arguments are presented through an adversary process to an impartial adjudicator who renders a decision on the merits. Compared with procedures used in other advanced countries, ours are elaborate and hence relatively expensive. They also force the parties, rather than the state, to bear most of the cost of finding the facts, thus adding further to the burden of going to court.

Despite the expense, lawyers have such faith in these procedures that they often act as if virtually every human question could be resolved by gathering data, listening to arguments, and analyzing the issues with an eye to existing precedent and an ample dose of common sense. Thus, when Congress instructed the federal courts to invalidate corporate mergers that "tended substantially to lessen competition," judges refrained from establishing simple rules and began admitting all manner of evidence in a case-by-case review of disputed mergers even though the question they set out to resolve was almost surely unanswerable. In the personal liability field, judges expanded their proceedings by asking juries to assume the baffling task of trying to place a monetary value on pain and suffering although the predictable result was to encourage a rise in litigation and the growth of the most unsavory and deceptive practices to achieve generous awards from gullible juries. More recently, one learns from accounts of the Hinckley case that judges will periodically make a heroic effort to predict whether those who have successfully used the insanity defense still pose a threat to the safety of their fellow man. The law's response to disputes, therefore, is cumbersome and expensive even in the best of circumstances and is often extended to issues where the costs seem extremely hard to justify.

Another characteristic of adjudication is the tendency to concentrate on the immediate case at hand while giving less attention to the effects on a wider public. Professor Atiyah has eloquently shown how far this trend has proceeded in Anglo-American law over the past century.[5] The practice is understandable, but the results are troublesome from several points of view, since legal proceedings and judicial opinions often have their greatest effects on people who are neither parties to the litigation nor even aware that it is going on. Decisions that emphasize the peculiarities of each case can give too little guidance to this wider public and thus can spread confusion. Worse yet, as law suits get more enmeshed in details, they cause greater expenses and delays that inhibit the poor and middle class from ever going to court, especially under an adversary system that places so many of the costs of fact-finding and litigation on the parties. Consider the problem of collecting debts. As matters now stand, only institutional creditors can normally afford to press their claims on an economical basis. As a result, up to 90 percent of the defendants in large cities never appear to argue their case, even though many of them have a strong defense.[6] To counteract this problem, the government may provide legal counsel free of charge, but that device merely reverses the tables, since it is uneconomical for institutional lenders to prepare sufficiently to resist a determined defendant unless the unpaid debt is very large. In both situations, the elements of fair process may be observed. In neither case will justice necessarily be done.

By concentrating so heavily on the immediate parties in dispute, judges are also more likely to reach results that affect other people in unexpected and undesirable ways. For example, suppose that judges in divorce cases begin to move away from the traditional presumption in favor of awarding custody to the mother. The principal impact of such rulings will not fall on disputing parents but on the vastly larger number of divorcing couples who agree on separation terms and only go to court to have their settlement approved. For these couples, the effect of the decisions may be far from what the judges actually intended. Instead of simply leading to more agreements giving custody to fathers, the new rules may strengthen the father's negotiating position and enable him to push his anxious wife into accepting less money for support in order to be sure of keeping the children.[7]

Such examples can be multiplied endlessly. One can sympathize with judges, of course, since they have neither the staff nor the resources to study the full impact of their decisions. Even the law reviews do not provide much help, since legal scholars are rarely trained in the methods of empirical investigation and hence do not devote themselves to exploring the actual effects of legal rules on human behavior. Regardless of who is responsible, however, the results of this neglect are unfortunate. Not only will judges be more likely to reach decisions that are quixotic or perverse. I also suspect that the failure to examine the impact of legal rules can lead judges and regulators to have inflated and unrealistic notions about the capacity of their rulings to influence behavior and produce social change.

The problems just described might be contained if our legal system empowered someone to keep watch and make sure that the process as a whole is meeting the needs of those whom it purportedly serves. Unfortunately, such oversight and coordination do not exist. In principle, the legislature could exercise this authority, but it does so only occasionally and in a political environment that severely limits what can be done. Thus, power is divided among countless jurisdictions and tribunals, each intent upon the isolated fragments of human conflict that come before it. No one feels responsible for the operation of the entire system or worries whether the different parts fit together in a coordinated whole.

This environment produces a special kind of justice. It leads conscientious officials to exaggerate the power of legal rules to produce social change while underestimating the cost of establishing rules that can be actually enforced throughout the society. Since laws seem deceptively potent and cheap, they multiply quickly. Though most of them may be plausible in isolation, they are often confusing and burdensome in the aggregate, at least to those who have to take them seriously. Contrary to the views of left-wing legal scholars, the results are not simply a form of exploitation to oppress poor, defenseless people; the wealthy and the powerful also chafe under the burden. For established institutions, in particular, the common result is a stifling burden of regulations, delays, and legal uncertainties that can inhibit progress and allow unscrupulous parties to misuse the law to harass and manipulate their victims. For those of modest means, results are even more dispiriting. Laws and procedural safeguards may proliferate, but they are of scant use to someone who cannot afford a lawyer. All too often their ultimate effect is to aggravate costs and delays that deny legal protection to large majorities of the population.

In fairness, I should acknowledge that much new thought is now being devoted to these problems. Rarely has this country seen a time of such creative experimentation to reduce costs, simplify laws, and improve access for the poor and middle class. Whole bodies of rules and litigation have been washed away through deregulation and no-fault legislation. Lawmakers have talked of sunset provisions and impact statements to attract greater attention to the costs and burdens of legal rules. All manner of efforts are under way to establish alternate forums to reduce the cost of resolving disputes. At the same time, prepaid plans are growing to bring legal services within the reach of the middle class, not to mention the support Congress has given to the Legal Services Corporation to provide attorneys for the poor.

Despite this burst of creativity and initiative, we have a long way to go even to see a glimmer of light at the end of the tunnel. Experiments may abound, but there is often no rigorous, comprehensive process for evaluating such ventures to decide which work well and under what circumstances. Lacking such data, one cannot know which remedies fit the various kinds of disputes that need to be resolved. Worse yet, only rarely do analysts or scholars look at entire categories of legal regulation either to define appropriate goals or to study the impact of rules on those whom the law purports to serve. As a result, in few fields of law can one find a thoughtful debate, let alone a consensus, on such questions as how clear the applicable rules should be, how elaborate and costly the procedures should become, or how quickly disputes need to proceed to a hearing and final resolution. So long as this confusion persists, the effectiveness of the legal system will remain obscure. No complex human enterprise can succeed without some way of establishing objectives, coordinating the work of all constituent parts, and assessing the progress made toward accepted goals.

As for the poor and middle class, we again have no idea what kind of access the legal system should provide. On occasion, the Legal Services Corporation has suggested some specific goal, such as so-and-so many lawyers per 10,000 people. But targets of this kind are meaningless without a description of just what legal services and protections such representation would achieve. One sometimes reads that the poor have received legal help in 15 percent of the cases in which they needed assistance. But no one seems inclined to consider how much legal assistance the poor actually need, let alone what services society can afford to provide. Should they enjoy free legal service for any complaint they have? Presumably not. But then, what kinds of cases or legal rights are serious enough to make legal aid a legitimate national responsibility? The truth is that the issue is not discussed and since it is not discussed, we have no way of appraising how bad our present system is or what it would take to reach a reasonable goal.

In this state of ignorance, one constantly hears appeals for reforms that seem quite plausible but could lead to unexpected difficulties. For example, Chief Justice Burger periodically calls for massive improvements in the training of trial lawyers. At first glance, who could object to such a proposal? But it is probable that such a reform, standing by itself, would increase litigation, lengthen trials, and add significantly to the very burdens which the Chief justice wishes to lighten. More disturbing are the recurrent appeals to divert more federal funds to systems of judicare which represent the most costly of all likely methods of extending greater access to the poor. Put bluntly, present efforts at reform include some proposals that seem unwise or even dangerous along with others that represent, at best, little more than random efforts to keep matters from getting worse. The result is hardly an adequate response to the problems that confront us.

An effective program of reform must involve an effort both to simplify rules and procedures and to give greater access to the poor and middle class. Access without simplification will be wasteful and expensive; simplification without access will be unjust. Such a program will presumably call for bolder steps along a number of lines already described. Lawmakers will need to adopt no-fault car insurance everywhere and extend the no-fault concept to new fields of liability. Legislatures will have to take a hard look at provisions for treble damages and other artificial incentives that stimulate litigation. Agency officials will want to mount a broad review of existing laws to simplify rules and eliminate regulations that do not serve a demonstrable public purpose. Simplification must be accompanied by larger appropriations to make legal counsel available to the poor. But money alone will not suffice. Judges will have to develop less costly ways of resolving disputes in recognition of the fact that expensive adversary trials in many kinds of cases ultimately deny access, and therefore justice, to countless deserving people. Lawyers will need to devise new institutions to supply legal services more cheaply, and that will undoubtedly force the organized bar to reexamine traditional attitudes toward fee-for-service and the unauthorized practice of law.

These steps will be difficult enough, but I suspect that even they will prove to be only palliatives. To make real progress, two further efforts will be needed.

To begin with, I doubt that a satisfactory legal system will emerge without a greater effort to plan and coordinate the work of all our separate courts and jurisdictions. In a system filled with different tribunals, each preoccupied with the random disputes that happen to pass before it, every judge can conscientiously perform his appointed task and still unwittingly subject many individuals to injustices and incongruous results. In some way, we need to develop mechanisms for reviewing whole bodies of law and their effects on the people they purport to serve. Only then can the appropriate officials set objectives and develop coordinated strategies to allow fields of law such as personal liability or environmental protection or employment discrimination to meet the needs of those whose lives they affect.

In addition, judges, lawmakers, scholars will all have to recognize that our basic conception of the role and limits of law has fallen in disrepair. In its place, they will need to search for a new conception more realistic in appreciating the limitations and the costs of legal rules and procedures. This effort should entail fewer rules, but they will be more important, better understood, and more widely enforced throughout the society. Lacking such a vision, judges and regulators will continue to drift more and more toward a willingness to intervene whenever they feel that one person has suffered at the hands of another. That is the logical end of a process that concentrates on the plight of individual litigants and ignores the effects on the system as a whole. The result will be a spurious form of justice. In such a world, the law may seem enlightened and humane, but its constant stream of rules will leave a wake strewn with the disappointed hopes of those who find the courts too complicated to understand, too quixotic to command respect, and too expensive to be of any practical use.

THE ROLE OF LAW SCHOOLS

The prospects for achieving such reforms are daunting, I realize. A comprehensive attack on the defects of our legal system will call for help from every quarter: lawyers, judges, legislators, regulatory officials. I will not try to describe the contributions that each of these parties can make. The occasion does not allow it, and my qualifications are unequal to the task. If I have a comparative advantage, it lies in education, and it is there that I would concentrate my attention.

I have referred at various points to our ignorance about matters essential to enlightened reform. The public complains about the cost of legal services, but no one has discovered how much money we spend each year on our legal system. Communities experiment with alternative forums for resolving disputes, but do not evaluate these experiments systematically to learn which ones work and how well. Though doctors are learning to assess the costs and benefits of medical procedures and new technologies, lawyers are not making a comparable effort to evaluate provisions for appeal, for legal representation, for adversary hearings, or for other legal safeguards to see whether they are worth in justice what they cost in money and delay. Scholars have shown little interest in the theories of cognition that might help decide whether rules of evidence permit judges to make more accurate decisions or merely accumulate useless data that add to legal expenses and delays. Nor has anyone troubled to explore the forces that encourage or inhibit litigation so that we can better predict the rise and fall of legal activity.

This stunted curiosity and limited knowledge seriously inhibit efforts to increase efficiency and access in the legal system. It is idle to talk of sunset provisions if lawmakers lack the methods to assess the costs and benefits of legislation. It is useless to create arbitration panels and mediation services if no one troubles to test their performance against predetermined criteria. It is reckless to offer proposals to ease congestion in the courts if even the proponents cannot tell whether such measures will achieve their goal or simply evoke more litigation much as wider highways often succeed in merely calling forth more cars.

Although these points seem obvious enough, law schools have not seized the opportunity to seek the knowledge that the legal system requires. In part, perhaps, this neglect results from the lawyer's skepticism about the usefulness of academic research. Over a century ago, Christopher Columbus Langdell was fond of asserting that law is a science and "that all of the available materials of that science are contained in printed books . . ."—law books. More recently, a witty law professor remarked: "All research corrupts, but empirical research corrupts absolutely."

It is easy to find examples to justify this skepticism. One's eyes glaze over at the recollection of parking meter studies, scalograms to predict judicial behavior, game theories that purport to illumine litigation tactics. Yet we ignore the social sciences at our peril, for their techniques grow steadily more refined. Business school professors begin to have more intricate theories of competitive markets that might help legal analysts predict the effect of changes in our antitrust laws. Scholars in schools of public policy and education develop more sophisticated methods of program evaluation that could help implement sunset laws or detect the secondary and tertiary effects of legal rules on human behavior. Doctors work with statisticians to measure the costs and benefits of protracted hospitalization, of coronary bypass surgery, of mastectomy, of CAT scanning; one cannot help but wonder whether similar techniques might not help assess the usefulness of legal procedures as well.

As yet, this work is largely overlooked by our great schools of law. One can argue that such studies are not the proper province of the legal scholar and that it is better to wait for social scientists in other parts of the university to do the necessary research. But experience shows how empty this observation is. Law professors cannot stand idly by and expect others to investigate their problems. Social scientists have not done much of this work in the past nor will they in the future. If the necessary research is to go forward, legal scholars must help organize it and participate in it, albeit with the aid of interested colleagues from other disciplines.

If law schools are to do their share in addressing the basic problems of our legal system, they will need to adapt their teaching as well as their research. The hallmark of the curriculum still resides in its emphasis on training students to define the issues carefully and to marshall all of the arguments and counterarguments on either side. Law schools celebrate this effort by constantly telling students that they are being taught "to think like a lawyer." But one can admire the virtues of careful analysis and still believe that the times cry out for more than these traditional skills. After all, as I have tried to point out, the capacity to think like a lawyer has produced many triumphs, but it has also helped to produce a legal system that is among the most expensive and least efficient in the world.

One example of this problem is the familiar bias in the law curriculum toward preparing students for legal combat. Look at a typical catalog. You will discover many courses in the intricacies of trial practice, procedure, litigation strategy, and the like—but few devoted to methods of mediation and negotiation. Professors spend vast amounts of time examining the decisions of appellate courts, but make little effort to explore new voluntary mechanisms that might enable parties to resolve various types of disputes without going to court in the first place. We have long debated whether lawyers exacerbate controversy or help to prevent it from arising. Doubtless, they do some of each. But no one can dispute that law schools train their students more for conflict than for the gentler arts of reconciliation and accommodation. This emphasis is likely to serve the profession poorly. Already, lawyers devote more time to negotiating conflicts than they spend in the library or the courtroom, and studies show that their efforts to negotiate are more productive for their clients. Over the next generation, I predict that society's greatest opportunities will lie in tapping human inclinations toward collaboration and compromise rather than stirring our proclivities for competition and rivalry. If lawyers are not leaders in marshalling cooperation and designing mechanisms which allow it to flourish, they will not be at the center of the most creative social experiments of our time.

Another glaring deficiency lies in the lack of attention given to the very problems of the legal system that I have discussed tonight. This neglect is particularly striking when one hears the repeated claims of established law schools that they are not training lawyers but preparing "leaders of the bar." If we are to take this assertion seriously, one would suppose that students in these schools would be studying ways of creating simpler rules, less costly legal proceedings, and greater legal protection for the poor and middle class. Yet even a cursory glance at the law school catalog will serve to destroy this illusion. I cannot recall a single class, let alone an entire course, devoted to these issues during my three years of law study. Although the situation has improved since then, courses on the problems of the legal system are almost always relegated to elective slots where only a handful of students typically attend.

Leadership also calls for more than merely preparing leaders of the bar. Law schools will need to take the initiative in educating for a broader range of legal needs in our society. An efficient system of extending access to legal services throughout the society will demand the imaginative use of paralegal personnel. An effective system for extending legal protection to the poor must involve greater efforts to educate the disadvantaged about their rights, so that they can defend their interests without being exploited or having to go to court. A serious effort to provide cheaper methods of resolving disputes will require skilled mediators and judges, who are trained to play a much more active part in guiding proceedings toward a fair solution. In short, a just and effective legal system will not merely call for a revised curriculum; it will entail the education of entire new categories of people. It is time that our law schools began to take the lead in helping devise such training.

Beyond education and research, law schools can also help to create new institutions more efficient than traditional law firms in delivering legal services to the poor and middle class. As in medicine, these organizations will benefit if they are linked to a university so that they can offer teaching opportunities and intellectual stimulation to their attorneys while drawing upon the services of second- and third-year law students. Medical schools have long pioneered in similar efforts, first by helping create teaching hospitals, and then by developing outreach clinics in poorer neighborhoods and prepaid health plans for the middle class. By comparison, the record of our law schools is modest, despite the recent growth of clinical programs.

The points I have made need not be cast in the form of criticism; they also represent opportunities to strike at the most persistent vexations that have troubled our law schools. For example, other faculties often look askance at law professors for devoting themselves to pedestrian forms of research, endlessly pecking at legal puzzles within a narrow framework of principles and precedent. In contrast, efforts to confront the larger problems of the legal system offer the chance to address a much broader range of issues using a wider array of research techniques.

Students have also complained for years about the sameness of legal instruction with its constant discussion of borderline cases and problems. Happily, the great issues confronting our profession provide opportunities to pursue a variety of experiments in teaching and learning—classes to study the methods of mediation and negotiation, supervised work in new institutions for delivering legal services, courses on the organization and deficiencies of the legal system and its institutions, seminars on new ways of resolving disputes and avoiding litigation.

A final problem for law schools is the striking lack of professional commitment displayed by many of their students. Unlike medicine, few young people decide to be lawyers early in life. Instead, law schools have traditionally been the refuge of able, ambitious college seniors who cannot think of anything else they want to do. With such lukewarm beginnings, it is not surprising that students grow apathetic toward their studies and seem unwilling after their first year to prepare their coursework or participate in class discussions. If law faculties wish to counter these attitudes, they should welcome the chance to motivate their students by giving them a larger vision of their calling, a sense of what a life of leadership in the bar might entail, an awareness of the urgent problems of the profession that they could help to resolve.

The law school that seizes these opportunities could become a more interesting place, experimenting with new methods of teaching, new forms of research, even new institutional settings for combining instruction with legal services. Fortunately, a handful of schools seem ent upon exploring these opportunities. I am pleased that my own is mbered among them. If this movement does not grow and law ools cannot rise to the challenge. I see little hope that we will ever mount the present afflictions of our legal system. In this, we may ain have something to gain from the experience of medicine. There ve been many mistakes in organizing health care, and ignorance on tical points is still profound. But we have surely learned one lesson. gardless of the number of rules, however elaborate the regulations, re will be no reform of the health care system without the active operation of the doctors. Only physicians can decide how to cut costs thout endangering human life, and only physicians can make the riad of small decisions about medical treatment, medical tests, the loyment of new technologies that ultimately fix the size of our lth care bill.

The same is true of the legal system. Outsiders can voice concern l threaten drastic action. But only lawyers can devise the procedures, legislative reforms, the incentives that will increase efficiency, uce costs, and extend reasonable justice to all. In the end, we will make lasting progress without the help of the organized bar, and we hardly expect such help unless our law schools produce the ideas, knowledge, and the kind of leaders we need to take us to higher und. It is time we joined together to give this effort the attention it lainly deserves.

THE LOST ART OF DRAWING THE LINE

The double slide in Oologah, Oklahoma, donated to the town park by the Kiwanis Club, was a local landmark. For fifty years this slide, looking like two legs of a spider, had provided fun for the children of Oologah. In 1995, however, a child suffered minor injuries while playing unattended on the slide, and the parents made a claim against the town. "I knew it was going then," said Judy Ashwood, fifty-three, who herself had played on the slide as a child. "It's hard for me to think that people who live here would actually sue the city if their child fell off the slide." But the town board decided it had no choice, notwithstanding a citizen petition asking that the slide remain in the park. It auctioned off the slide to a resident of a nearby town, getting $326.50, and the Oologah park slide was carted away.

All across America, playgrounds are being closed or stripped of standard equipment. In 1997, Bristol, Connecticut, removed all of the seesaws and merry-go-rounds from its playgrounds. When told of the decision, the face of thirteen-year-old Jennifer Bartucca fell with disappointment. "Every time I come here, I ask a friend to go on the seesaws. It is one of my favorite things to do at the park," said Jennifer: "I love merry-go-rounds. My father would push me on them when I was a little kid." Nicole LaPierre, sixteen, was equally disappointed. "If you play right, you're not going to get hurt."

Being safe has come a long way since Ralph Nader pointed out the absence of safety guidelines for cars and other consumer products. Avoiding risk is now practically a religion. But it's not clear that the results are necessarily what most people want. Some towns, for example, have the resources to replace the playground equipment with new, safer alternatives, including transparent tubes to crawl through and a one-person seesaw that works on a spring. Can you wait? The new equipment is so boring, according to Lauri Macmillan Johnson, a professor of landscape architecture at the University of Arizona, that children make up dangerous games, like crashing into the equipment with their bicycles.

The headlong pursuit of safety is killing off the simple pleasures of life. Why take a risk on an activity that's not absolutely necessary? The town of Park City, Utah, had a proposal to make bicycles available for free to tourists and others, both to alleviate the traffic and to make the town more attractive. Most people old enough to ride a bicycle are aware of the hazards. But accidents happen, and after concerns were raised about the possibility of a horrible accident, the plan was stopped. Better safe than sorry. Larck Lake, in West Virginia, had been open to fishermen and picnickers since 1993. But the owners got scared because teenagers coming up to a party there often decided to go swimming. "We felt that, sooner or later, there would be an accident," said Fred Stottlemyer, an official with the company that owns the lake, "so we decided to close the lake to recreational use." Bob Petryszak, who bought a house nearby because of the lake, was disappointed. "This is a great place to fish. The recreation it provides is a great asset to the area. There should be a way to keep it open."

Fun is optional, of course. The prophets of safety certainly practice a gloomy earnestness. But some activities that we've cut out are pretty important. Psychologists tell us, for example, that children need affection. Even before there were psychologists, most people, and animals as well, showed affection to their young. But in America, hugging or, indeed, even a pat on the back is now considered so dangerous that teachers can't do it. "Our policy is basically don't hug children," said Lynn Maher, speaking for the New Jersey chapter of the National Education Association (NEA). The guidelines of Pennsylvania's NEA chapter urge teachers to do no more than "briefly touch" a child's arm or shoulder. Michigan passed a law that forbade teachers to touch students for any reason. We're well on our way to a society where, as Ann Welch, a special-education teacher in Virginia, put it, "we tell children that karate is okay and hugs aren't."

Being safe, maybe extra-safe, is what we say is happening. But nobody really believes that. What's going on has little to do with risk to other people. It's mainly about avoiding legal risk for the person conducting the activity. "Ultimately, we came to the conclusion we were exposing ourselves to too much liability" by allowing people to keep using Larck Lake, said Mr. Stottlemyer. Charles Montgomery, who bought the double slide from the town of Oologah and set it up for his children in the backyard, put his finger on the problem. "It's a shame," Mr. Montgomery said. "I just see a kind of dying part of most people's childhood. It's going away because of society and lawyers."

People talk about the "litigation explosion" whenever a headline announces a huge verdict on some ordinary accident, like the $2.9 million verdict against McDonald's (later reduced to $640,000) when an elderly lady spilled the hot coffee while pulling away from the drive-thru window. Exorbitant verdicts are the exception, however, and don't directly touch the lives of most Americans. But law has changed our culture. Instead of looking where we want to go, Americans are constantly looking over our shoulders.

The effects are sometimes tragic. Christopher Sercye, fifteen, was shot while playing basketball on a playground close to the Ravenswood Hospital in Chicago. With the help of two friends, the boy made it to within thirty feet of the hospital entrance. When Christopher collapsed, almost at the hospital door, his friends ran in to get help, but the emergency-room staff refused to come out. Hospital policy was that they should not leave the hospital because, as the explanation later indicated, of fear of possible legal liability for neglecting patients already in the hospital. But going thirty feet outside the hospital is not much different for staff than going thirty feet inside. As Christopher lay bleeding on the sidewalk, a policeman begged the staff to come out. But the hospital staff refused to budge and instead placed a call to 911. Christopher lay on the sidewalk for twenty-five minutes before a police sergeant arrived and commandeered a wheelchair to bring him in. The boy died shortly afterward.

Life-and-death decisions used to be more important than anything, certainly more important than legal niceties about duties to sick people thirty feet in one direction versus thirty feet in another. But Americans today act as if we're wearing legal blinders that block any sensible perspective. When a possible legal risk pops up before our narrow range of vision, however remote or ridiculous, we react like rats to an electric shock. Why take the legal risk?

A new medical school graduate, one week away from getting her license to practice, was recently driving in suburban New York when she came upon a motorcycle accident with the rider sprawled on the side of the road, obviously badly injured. After a brief discussion with her mother, she decided not to stop because she might be liable for practicing without a license. At first blink, her logic seems perfectly reasonable. But this only shows how warped we've become. How about helping out because you're a human being who happens to have the skills to save a life?

Some suggest that Americans are just being irrational, pumped up by scare tactics of corporations and greedy coconspirators wanting to undermine the American legal system. Put yourself in the position of the doctor whose patient has a bad headache. Is it aspirin, or a CAT scan? Pretend you're in charge of making decisions on the school playground equipment. Are you a little uneasy?

The air in America is so thick with legal risk that you can practically cut it and put it on a scale. A volunteer teacher in East Harlem was working with a group of nine-year-olds when one kept shoving the others, ignoring the teacher's repeated requests and commands that he stop. Finally, she put her hands on his shoulders to tell him that he would be sent home if he didn't stop. The response of this youthful aggressor? "You can't touch me, that's against the law."

The accepted wisdom is that America is a diverse country, and the values of Americans have changed. But do contemporary Americans really suffer from differing views of what's too risky and what's not? Do most Americans really disagree on whether the bleeding boy should be attended to? Is society really so fractured over, say, the risk of letting the public enjoy a mountain lake? If everyone generally knows what's right or sensible, why doesn't he or she just make that decision? Not many years ago, we felt comfortable with these decisions. Today it's unthinkable.

We accept this perpetual legal anxiety as we would an incurable disease. What do you do? After all, people have their legal rights. The relevant issue is whether you can prove your position. We barely even question the system because, well, that's how law works.

More powerful than any invading army, than any constitution, is an accepted frame of reference. Today, Americans believe that fairness to individuals is the goal of justice. Of course it is, you're probably thinking. This is America. But what does it mean to be fair? What's fair, as most adults know, depends on your point of view. The reason we know American justice is fair, unassailable in its fairness, is that it avoids anyone's point of view. American justice is neutral. Fairness in modern America comes not from asserting beliefs but from avoiding them.

Judges see their responsibility, as Professor Michael Sandel observed, to make a "morally neutral judgment."

Who, even a judge, has the right to decide what's fair or not? Justice, we've been taught, is a matter merely of determining entitlement. Written law sets forth the standards, and the person will either prove the claim or not.

This neutral ideal of fairness has become a creed of our enlightened culture. Our children are trained from an early age to avoid making what are pejoratively referred to as "value judgments." "Everyone's views," Wake Forest University president Thomas Hearn recently noted, are now "as legitimate as anyone else's." Alan Wolfe, in One Nation, After All, a study of contemporary American values, suggests that there is now "an eleventh commandment: Thou shalt not judge."

Neutral justice appeals to almost everyone. It has a pure quality, as if untouched by human hands. It is available to anybody, at any time, fitting neatly in the American tradition of self-help.

Most important, neutral justice neutralizes authority. Americans of every political persuasion cringe at the idea of people imposing their beliefs of right and wrong. Liberals see justice that is neutral of personal values as protection against bigoted southern sheriffs. Conservatives see it as protection against power-hungry bureaucrats. Even critics of American litigation never question the premise that every individual should have the right to his day in a court proceeding untainted by personal beliefs. We lean back and close our eyes, reassured that there's a perfectly neutral forum to hear our point of view if someone tries to do something to us. That's what makes American justice fair, fairer than any in the history of civilization.

But fair to whom? How teachers got to be so nervous is easy to see. Just a charge of sexual harassment or abuse can ruin a career. An elementary school girl claimed sexual assault when a music teacher helped her position her fingers on a musical instrument. The teacher was cleared, "but the investigation and public embarrassment ended his life as he knew it." Some schools now require a second teacher or video surveillance in music and art class. The effect, according to an education official, is that "everyone's nervous" all the time, a kind of pedophilic version of the Red Scare.

Everyone was warmed up and ready to play in the Little League baseball game in Slingerlands, New York, but because of a scheduling glitch, the umpire didn't show. The coaches talked; several parents volunteered; everyone wanted to play, but the longer the discussion went on, the more nervous everyone got. "And what would happen if someone got hurt?" There might be legal liability, the coaches suggested, without the official umpire. The game was cancelled. Several teams of disappointed children went home.

Justice stands sentinel on the horizon of our daily choices and certainly looks fair with its perfectly neutral processes. First you argue, then I argue, and then the neutral decision. We like the fact that it's self-executing. It honors the right of each individual to make his case. But something is missing.

Law, we believe, is a system of individual rights. We almost can't imagine any other conception of fairness. But what about fairness to society as a whole? Stated differently, how about fairness to individuals as participants in society, like the players in Little League? Law serves a social function as well as an individual one. That used to be considered its main function. The rule of law was the main concern of our founders, but not, as one reformer put it, because they were expecting America to sue its way to greatness. Law is essential to a free society because it sets the rules we all abide by. As Justice Benjamin Cardozo put it, law must stand for "standard[s] of right conduct" that find expression in "the mores of the time."

When working properly, a law professor once said, justice is like the liver. You never notice it. People go through their lives comfortable with their instincts of right and wrong. We're not defensive. "Most of us live our lives in conscious submission to the rules of law," Cardozo noted, "without necessity to resort to courts to ascertain our rights and duties." Law is an instrument of freedom, not mainly as a forum to resolve disputes but because it allows us to act freely, confident that law will defend reasonable conduct. America's commercial law, generally well known and reliable, is the bedrock of our thriving economy. By letting everyone know where they stand, law liberates people to make free choices.

Social relations in America, far from steadied by law's sure hand, are a tangle of frayed legal nerves. Any dealings in public—whether in hospitals, schools, offices, or in the ebb and flow of daily life—are fraught with legal anxiety. An undertow pulls at us constantly, drawing us away from choices that we believe are reasonable. Legal fear has become a defining feature of our culture.

Americans today seem to abide by a kind of law by journalism, reacting to whatever risks newspapers write about. Several New York private schools instituted peanut-free cafeterias after publicity about horrible reactions that can occur in people born with the peanut allergy. Nationally, only a few people every year die from allergic reactions to food of all kinds (estimates range from 5 to 120). Moreover, those with the peanut allergy know it, and most carry an antidote syringe at all times. But peanut butter is undoubtedly a terrible risk to a tiny fraction of the population, and after the newspapers spread the word, who will protect you from liability if the unlikely but terrible allergic reaction occurs? Try getting peanuts on most airlines now. In one fit of fear, the miracles of George Washington Carver are swept away.

Doing something wrong is not what scares most Americans. What we're afraid of is someone claiming we did. Who and for what? We don't know. It almost seems it could be anyone, in almost any situation. A sick person who gets sicker. A child who misrepresents a touch, or just wants to make a claim and see what will happen.

Litigation reforms are suggested all the time, and some are enacted, but without doing much to soothe raw nerves. The one suggestion no reformer has made, to my knowledge, is that America has too little law. Law, as everyone says, is all around us. We're tied up in legal knots. What's the effect, we constantly ask ourselves, on so-and-so's rights? But we don't pause to ask ourselves why the answer is almost never clear. Do we have too much law, or too little law that anyone can rely upon? While we talk about rights all the time, what kind of legal right is it that no one can identify with any clarity?

We can't get the notion out of our heads that justice is about being as fair as we can to every individual who shows up at the courthouse. The allegorical figure of Justice is carved above the courthouse door. There she calmly sits, her eyes blindfolded to symbolize impartiality. Just the image gives us comfort. Justice has integrity. Nothing is rigged. Courts have always had to be impartial, of course, but our aspiration for neutrality goes much further than making sure judges have no personal stake in the controversy. Modern justice is almost monastic in its self-denial. Appear before an American court and you will be given every chance, every benefit.

But is that what it means to live under the rule of law? Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., once defined law as "the prophesies of what courts will do." Maybe Justice Holmes has put his finger on our problem. Today in America, justice may be neutral, but nobody has any idea what a court will do. Our quest to achieve individual fairness through neutrality has had an unintended side effect: America, so proud of its rule of law, has lost the law needed for people to have a sense of what they can and can't do.

Archaeologists a thousand years from now will dig up our remains and give us a name. Instead of the Age of Reason, we'll be the Age Without Reason. Our amused descendants may not figure out that the seesaws disappeared in a fit of legal frenzy. What they'll see, in plain language, are the warning labels on every product. Then we'll be found out: We were the society that lost the guidance of law, and, with its demise, lost the ability to distinguish between what's reasonable and what's not. In the ruins at Yale Law School, they'll find plastic bags warning against throwing the "mortarboard" graduation caps up in the air.

Weren't Yale law students smart enough to deal with the hazard? All preconceived notions of our eating habits will be thrown for a loop when they find a federal form cautioning against eating the toner of the photocopier. They'll really wonder about the coffee. What did we mean by warnings on practically every cup about its being extremely "hot"? Was coffee some kind of aphrodisiac?

The test of justice, Justice Cardozo once observed, is how people feel about it. If our system of justice is fairer than it used to be, people sure are reacting in an odd way. Americans are scared, but they're not scared of vigilantes roaming free in a land without justice. Americans are scared of justice itself, because it no longer is based on law.

RIGHTS WITHOUT LAW

In the spring of 1996, in the sandbox at Charles River Park in Boston, Jonathan Inge, then three years old, kicked another three-year-old, Stacey Pevnev. Stacey's mother told Jonathan to stop in no uncertain terms. The mothers proceeded to have words. Jonathan's social graces left something to be desired, and there was a pushing incident. At this point, Stacey and her mother could have left the playground or gone to another area, but Stacey's mother had her own problems in the social interaction area, and she decided instead to call the police. The police punted. The Pevnevs then decided to go to court. Within days, they were arguing away in Suffolk County Court. Did the judge toss the case out with a laugh? In the new America, the judge actually adjudicated the dispute, granting a preliminary injunction requiring the parents "to keep each child supervised and separated from each other while in the playground" and prohibiting the mothers from talking to each other.

Just think of the possibilities. Have you had an argument with anyone lately? Why deal with it face-to-face when you can go to court? Traditionally, courts were not official versions of The Jerry Springer Show. A Boston lawyer, Roderick MacLeish, observed dryly that "we need to take a serious look at what's going on in this country."

What people claim as their rights, at least from a distance, is pretty entertaining. A bank robber in New Jersey sued the teller for slander: He only demanded money at gunpoint and did not, as she testified, threaten also to shoot. How dare she draw that inference? Typical bank-teller prejudice. Boston judge Hiller Zobel has been asked to decide a custody fight over a dog, a claim over a missing prize in a Cracker Jack box, and a lawsuit over ownership of birth control pills between a fifteen-year-old and a thirteen-year-old. These claims usually don't succeed, but they are symptoms of a society-wide preoccupation with rights.

You can't do much that's significant, or even funny, without thinking about your or someone else's rights. Rights cruise back and forth through our consciousness like a police car on patrol. If the Gallup polls could register the thoughts that most often cross American minds, number one would be easy to predict. But rights would be right up there.

Any dispute immediately reverts to the language of rights. We can't think of the law except as a matter of individual rights. Law is rights, rights are law. My suggestion that American society needs more law to let people know where they stand seems like a bad joke. We know where we stand: on a legal battlefield. Rights are everywhere.

But what is a right? For all we've thought about it, a right could be a quark. We can describe well enough individual rights that we learned about in civics class—basically constitutional rights against government abuse. There's the right of free speech, and no prosecutor can put us in jail on a whim. Our founders made sure Americans had rights to prevent government from using state power to interfere with our freedom. But these hallowed rights against government coercion—what philosopher Isaiah Berlin referred to as "negative liberties"—aren't the kinds of rights, happily, that most Americans worry about day to day.

Rights in our daily thoughts concern suing and being sued by other people. We can't readily describe what gives someone the right to sue someone else, but we know how this "right" operates: like a legal jack-in-the-box, ready to pop up whenever there's a misunderstanding, or an accident, or any bad event.

Because the theory of rights is one of legal entitlement, no one questions the ability to sue. A court will determine that a person either has the right or he doesn't. Rights are like a piece of property. That's why they're called rights. "A person's rights are what belong to him as his due, what he is entitled to," Professor Peter Weston stated, "hence what he can rightly demand of others."

Law as a whole, we've been taught, is like an interlocking puzzle of everyone's rights. This is a conception that philosophers like John Rawls advocated in the 1960s and 1970s. A just society doesn't impose its own views of right or wrong in a particular dispute; it only provides "a framework of rights, neutral among ends." As Professor Mark Tushnet put it, we envision "a world of autonomous individuals each guided by his or her . . . goals, none of which can be adjudged more or less legitimate than those held by others."

Something obviously slipped between Rawls's theory, however, and the actual practice of his system of rights allocated around society. Most so-called rights that people assert look a lot more like selfishness dressed up in legal clothes.

A young couple in our neighborhood, a doctor and an actress, visited his parents on New Year's Eve. The sidewalk was icy, and just as they were getting to the front door, she slipped and broke her ankle. Her response came out of the new American playbook: She sued his parents. The goal was not to recover medical costs (apparently she was insured), and certainly not to hit up her in-laws. The idea was to go after a windfall from the parents' insurance company. The broken ankle would certainly affect her dancing abilities. She got a huge settlement from suing his parents. Now that's certainly ingenious. But isn't insurance supposed to be for real lawsuits? Doesn't that attitude just raise the costs of everyone else's insurance? Never mind. Accidents are assumed to be an occasion to make money. You almost feel like a chump if you don't at least threaten to sue.

Three employees of the Seattle Police Department got disability a few years ago for falling out of their swivel chairs. There's a new one. Actually not: A few years earlier the city of Miami had a rash of disability claims from employees for falling out of chairs, suffering paper cuts, and similar tragedies. But what do you do? The doctor's letter says it is an injury, and the injury happened in the line of duty. The legal logic is open and shut. Instead of telling the cops to get another job, Seattle dutifully replaced the suspect equipment with straight chairs. Now the employees can't swivel around to talk with their buddies, and they're complaining about cricks in their necks. Life has so many pitfalls. Maybe they should all collect disability or, better yet, call 911: "My chair did it."

The question in each case, we're told, is one of legal entitlement. But latching onto a legal principle doesn't seem that difficult. A depressive professor fired for abusing women sues under the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) to try to get his job back. When it passed the ADA, Congress had in mind accommodating the disabled who couldn't make it into the job market, not keeping abusive people on the job. But legal arguments soon spin a web that protects abusers against the abused.

Each dispute must be viewed on its own terms, evaluated against a neutral standard, and decided by a jury or other neutral decision maker. Individual rights, as Rawls suggested, are "not subject . . . to the calculus of social interests." There's no one with authority to, say, distinguish between a broken leg and a scrape, or between a self-indulgent creep and someone with multiple sclerosis. People are regarded "as isolated islands of individuality," as Professor Tushnet puts it, whose dealings with one another and society "can metaphorically be characterized as foreign affairs."

Rights have an almost theological power. Like primitive people before a holy man, when someone asserts their rights are violated, we immediately shrink back, cowed by the possible forces that might be unleashed against us.

Even judges find themselves frozen by the power of someone's asserted rights. The judge knows that the sandbox case involving the three-year-olds is ridiculous, but if he furrows his brow and looks at the sandbox case as a matter of individual rights, the claim is perfectly logical, almost open-and-shut. How dare Jonathan Inge monopolize the sandbox with his bullying tactics. The sandbox is a public facility. The Pevnevs have just as much right to be there as he does. A dispute over three-year-olds sharing the sandbox is absurd, but what can he do? People have their rights.

Fairness is guaranteed whatever the result, we believe, because each party to the dispute had an equal right to make his arguments. But that view assumes that justice is only about fairness to the particular parties.

In 1995, confronting evidence that air bags could kill short adults or children, the federal government authorized a program that, by written permit, allowed air bags to be switched off. More than thirty thousand official federal permits were issued. But, after a year, barely one thousand cars had been modified. Dealers refused to make the modification because of fears of liability. Donna Nye, barely five feet tall, couldn't find anyone to turn off her air bags. "It's driving me berserk. What good is getting permission if no one will do it?" Janet Saker of Arlington, Massachusetts, four feet eleven inches tall, had the same problem: "I'm driving around with my heart in my mouth, and I'm afraid of the air bag blowing up and killing me."

Car dealers weren't trying to torture short people. They just perceived, correctly, that justice in America focuses on the predicament of the individual victim in the particular case, not on whether the dealers acted responsibly. After all, you never know when there'll be an accident or who'll be driving the car in the future. In the words of one Ford dealer in Rhode Island: "We're afraid, like everybody else. It's all fine and dandy until some attorney gets a hold of it."

In 1995, Harvard admitted an applicant on the basis of her excellent academic record and glowing recommendations from her high school. On an anonymous tip, Harvard learned that the student had killed her mother several years earlier by bludgeoning her with a lead crystal candlestick, and Harvard withdrew the acceptance. This fact, probably the most important event in the student's life, was omitted not only from her application but also from all of her recommendation letters. How could teachers and guidance counselors not have revealed this?

Guidance counselors are "afraid of telling the full truth" for fear of interfering with a student's rights, said Joyce Smith, executive director of the National Association for College Admission Counseling. "They'll write that Johnny took these courses and was a great student, but they won't tell you that Johnny burned down the gym. Whose job is it to tell admissions officers about that?"

Rights imply an interlocking puzzle where all entitlements fit, if not neatly, at least roughly, together. Consistency is, indeed, the indispensable feature of every system of law worthy of the appellation. The "basic moral principle, acknowledged by every legal system we know anything about," Professor Eugene Rostow once observed, "is that similar cases should be decided alike."

Justice based on individual rights, instead of striving for consistency, is closer to the opposite: single combat with an infinite line of potential claimants. In 1993, General Motors was found liable for $105.2 million when a GMC pickup exploded after being hit on the side. The explosion would not have occurred, the victim's lawyer pointed out, if the side-mounted gas tanks had been located somewhere else. Six years later, in 1999, General Motors was found liable for $4.9 billion (a dollar doesn't go as far nowadays) when a Chevrolet, stopped at a light, exploded when rear-ended by a car traveling at high speed. The argument was that the explosion might not have occurred if the gas tank were moved away from the rear. Practically everyone would be happy if vehicles used no gasoline, obviating the need for gas tanks altogether. But car design involves thousands of trade-offs of risks and costs. Where is a manufacturer supposed to put the tank?

There seem to be multiple rights at stake in each of these situations: the rights of the current car owner, and the rights of the future accident victim; the rights of the angry student, and rights of everyone else to an honest recommendation system. Whose right is more important?

Big companies just treat inconsistent claims as a cost of doing business, raising everyone's prices. But real people don't have that luxury. For most people, the possibility that a decision can be claimed to breach someone's rights is a good reason not to do it. Risk aversion is a powerful feature of human nature. Why take the chance?

For decades, reformers have given plaintive sermons about how people should act less like plaintiffs. Polls show that Americans bemoan selfish values, but every person, we believe, has the right to bring legal claims when they feel aggrieved. At least we know American justice is pure.

The more society frays, the tighter we cling to our ideal of neutral justice. A legal system that honors every individual's rights, we tell ourselves, will also protect us. Justice almost reeks of neutrality. Practically no claim is too extreme or disingenuous. Whenever there's a dispute, we reflexively drop to our knees before the altar of neutral process. Please, please, let justice be done.

Like ancient Mayans accepting human sacrifice or Catholics in the Middle Ages buying indulgences, Americans today accept that being sued is the price of freedom, and that diving for cover is the natural response to reasonable daily choices. Our faith in individual rights keeps us from pausing even to question this conception of justice. But should individual rights include the right to go to court over a sandbox disagreement involving three-year-olds, or to milk the system whenever there's a freak accident, or to scare towns and school systems out of seesaws and peanut butter? The idea of individual rights derives its moral force from the rhetoric of liberty. But is this what our founders had in mind when they organized a society around the freedom of each individual?

Actually, no. Our founding fathers would be shocked. There is no "right" to bring claims for whatever you want against someone else.

Suing is a use of state power. A lawsuit seeks to use government's compulsory powers to coerce someone else to do something. Asserting individual rights sounds benign, like praying in the church or synagogue of your choice. Sticking a legal gun in someone's ribs, however, is not a feature of what our founders intended as individual rights. The point of freedom is almost exactly the opposite: We can live our lives without being cowed by use of legal power. The individual rights our founders gave us were defensive, to protect our liberty. Liberty, we somehow forgot, does not include taking away someone else's liberty.

We assume justice is neutral. But it doesn't feel neutral. How well would you sleep at night if you were sued for, say, $100,000 when a child falls off your swing and breaks his leg? Suing is not a neutral event any more than being indicted for a crime is a neutral event. Both involve the risk, coming down to that fateful verdict by a jury picked at random, that the power of the state will compel a person to do something. Putting someone at risk, even if the claim is weak or ridiculous, involves the exercise of state power over him.

Courts are not supposed to be commercial establishments where, for the price of a lawyer, anyone can buy a chance at a raffle. Courts supposedly represent the wisdom of law, overseeing when those powers can be used against others in a free society. There's no right to sue except as the state permits.

I can practically feel your confusion. How else can we organize justice? People obviously have the ability to go to court. But by what rules and standards? Our modern consciousness is so focused on individual rights that we can't conceive of another way to ensure fairness. But if lawsuits are recognized as an exercise of state power, perhaps the state should make conscious judgments of who can sue for what. That's what legal rules and interpretations are for.

It's hard to remember, but until a few decades ago, people didn't go through the day worrying about suing or being sued. Students didn't threaten legal claims against teachers. Lawsuits were something only lawyers and judges worried about. Society wasn't perfect, but people felt free to make daily judgments based on what they believed was right.

People didn't used to talk about their rights to sue other people because law was considered a hurdle to surmount, not a free pass to a lottery. In a free society, you have no rights over another free citizen except when he affirmatively owes you a legal duty. Only when a court finds a legal duty is there a legal right to present a claim to a jury. You have a "right" to sue for breach of contract only because the contract imposes a duty. You have a right to sue a careless driver for a car accident because the law imposes a duty to drive like a reasonable person.

Looking at the sandbox dispute between the three-year-olds as a matter not of individual rights but of legal duty leads to a different result. In ordinary social interaction there is no legal duty to others. People are allowed to be rude, children are expected to be unreasonable. Citizens of a free society have to learn to deal with it. The case of three-year-old Jonathan Inge, and every case like it, must be dismissed unless there is a legal duty. Otherwise, we infect ordinary encounters with legal fear.

Medicine has been transformed. It's as if someone smashed the vial containing professional judgment. Legal fear has a "corrosive effect" on the doctor-patient relationship, according to Professor Robert Kagan, as "physicians, in a corner of their minds, regard patients as potential medical malpractice claimants." "We know we don't need [X rays]," one doctor admitted, "but you have to prove it in court." Medical students learn defensive practices, according to Professor Marshall Kapp, sometimes even "to falsify records": " 'A skillful lawyer could come back. . . . So you pad it a little.' "

Another common reaction, according to Dr. Christine Cassel, former president of the American College of Physicians, is that in critical situations doctors "turn over critical decisions to the family, which then makes the family feel like it's their fault when the patient dies." A doctor, Dr. Cassel says, should be "brave enough to put her arm around someone's shoulder and say medical science cannot keep your mother alive much longer, but she will not suffer and we will take good care of her." One study found that thousands of unconscious elderly people are kept alive by feeding tubes, not because people believe that's the right thing to do, but because doctors and relatives are legally afraid to make humane choices. One doctor described a patient who for six years "has not moved, spoken, or given any indication of consciousness," while "being supported by a tube in her windpipe attached to a respirator, by a tube in her stomach to continuously feed her, and by around-the-clock nursing care."

Legal fear has also poisoned professional relations, causing what Professor Kapp describes as "moral paralysis." In Phoenix a few years ago, three doctors resigned from a case because they believed another doctor was putting the patient's life in jeopardy with too high a medicine dosage.

But, fearing a lawsuit, they did not tell the patient or his family of their judgment. The patient went into shock and lapsed into a coma. As one of the doctors put it: "It is very difficult to intervene . . . because doctors are afraid the other doctors will sue them. And the supervising physicians and hospital administrators are also afraid to intervene because they might be sued later for letting the doctor have privileges in the first place."

Defenders of the current legal regime claim that, with the overhang of possible legal liability, doctors have an incentive to give the very best treatment. But if we consider patients in the waiting room and beyond, it's closer to a formula for medical meltdown. Every unnecessary half hour with one patient is time not spent with another, every CAT scan for someone who really doesn't need it is a CAT scan not available to someone who really does. Multiply the incidents by 700,000 doctors, making millions of choices every day, and the misdirection of medical resources is huge. Billions are squandered in unnecessary tests and treatments ordered by nervous doctors, and then partially recovered by managed care plans that resist treatment to all but the most insistent. The biggest losers are those who can least afford it, the weak and the elderly. Perhaps the ultimate irony is that, when called to account, bad doctors invoke the sanctity of their individual rights to keep practicing on unsuspecting patients.

Viewing justice through the lens of individual rights turns out to be an incomplete idea. The "rights" asserted by the parents of the child injured on the Ologah slide aren't the only rights that can be asserted. How about the "rights" of the parents who want to keep the slide for their children and grandchildren? They're not in the courtroom. Who's looking out for their interests?

A system of individual rights is almost irresistibly seductive. It empowers any individual to reach to the law. Everyone can do legal battle with, well, almost everyone. Anyone tries anything on us, and we can reach for its sword. It sounds so fair. It is so reassuring. But what if someone reaches for its sword to do something to us? What happens to us then? Organizing social relationships in a crowded society by individual rights is like handing out weapons to use whenever someone gets in the way, and then assuming everything will work out.

Individual rights don't exist in a vacuum. They're just "conclusions," as Professor Cass Sunstein observes, "masquerading as reasons." Allowing anyone to claim individual rights in a process that is value-neutral is not the rule of law. It's closer to a system of anti-law: a rhetorical society dedicated to individual self-interest.

NATURE ABHORS A VACUUM

American justice, I can hear the chorus, requires proof. You can't just drive straight to the bank. Making every litigant prove his claim is the foundation of modern American justice. That's why, we believe, a neutral system of justice is fair. Americans like the idea of proof. Making people prove their case sounds, well, like truth itself. Why is it, then, that modern justice generates such anxiety in our daily choices?

Several years ago, a homemaker brought the groceries home, put a large soda bottle next to a hot stove, and came back some time later to open it. Instead of grabbing hold of the cap and twisting it off, as the top is designed, this particular consumer took a knife and began carving at the plastic perforations around the bottle top. Now superpressured by the heat of the stove, the soda popped. Shooting off like a rocket, the bottle top as a projectile caused her to lose an eye. Just look at her. Imagine the force. Did you know carbonated beverages could cause such damage? Why wasn't there a warning? How much would that have cost? Not even a penny. Don't these rich companies care?

Every day millions of people, including young children, successfully negotiate the opening of soda. Is carbonated soda an unreasonable risk of life? But the victim of a freak accident got rich. Take a closer look the next time you buy soda in a large plastic bottle. Joining all the other warning signs that litter the landscape, some bottlers now dutifully place warnings about the risks of soda popping.

Our ideal of neutral justice is guarded by layers of preconceptions. Pull away one, like the belief that law is an interlocking puzzle of individual rights, and you will encounter another, like our belief in proof. There were undeniably no warnings against the dangers of carbonation or against putting the bottle near heat. So what exactly needs to be proved? What it means to prove a claim has received about as little thought as the scope of individual rights.

Let's take a simple case. How do we prove whether the slide in Ologah is unreasonably dangerous? It's probably not a frivolous claim. After all, the slide is high, and children aren't always careful. We have the evidence of a child who was hurt. Does that mean that the slide is unreasonably dangerous?

Seesaws are even more of a red flag. I could argue that seesaws are likely to be misused by some children. I recall standing at the middle of the seesaw using it as a balancing bar. I don't remember any bad falls on seesaws, but I do remember at age six trying to walk the banister of a friend's front porch as a kind of tightrope, falling headfirst into the water spigot, and being driven to the emergency room with blood flowing down my face. Does that mean my friend's mother should be sued for letting us play unattended on the front porch? How about letting us climb trees? The mimosa tree in our front yard in Tifton, Georgia, was particularly user-friendly, with smooth bark and long, low-hanging branches that were almost like a ladder up to higher branches. All the risks from these activities are easily foreseeable, but does that mean that slides and seesaws (and trees?) are unreasonably dangerous?

Let's go to hot coffee. The poster case arose when Stella Liebeck got third-degree burns when the McDonald's coffee spilled as her daughter drove her away from the drive-thru window. How do we prove whether hot coffee is unreasonable? Hotter coffee brews better and stays warmer longer. It can also scald. Hundreds of people had complained about McDonald's coffee over the years. But billions of cups—over one billion cups per year—kept being sold, indicating some measure of market acceptance. Why should a drive-thru window sell such hot coffee? Why not, aren't drivers grown up? Where do you draw the line? You can argue it either way.

No objective facts, no dispositive logic, can get you to a correct answer to these questions. So how do we decide? We can't, at least not on any provable basis. None of these cases hinges on proof. What's required is a value judgment. Value judgments, however, aren't provable. They're made of the one thing justice is trying so hard to avoid: what someone believes. Almost every claim involving a standard of safety, or care, or fairness requires a value judgment. Do we think carbonated soda is an ordinary risk of life or not? But someone has to decide who wins. What's wrong with a jury just making the value judgment? Juries, studies show, generally get to sensible results. But any claim that turns on a value judgment usually not only affects the immediate litigants but, as in medicine, has consequences that ripple out into society: Do we want doctors to feel they should give CAT scans for every bad headache or not? Making these societal decisions, however, has nothing to do with a jury's responsibilities. The jury's job in a civil case is to resolve disputed facts between the immediate parties. Juries don't even have the power to make rules for society. Consistency is impossible. Win or lose, nothing prevents someone else from bringing a similar, or contradictory, claim tomorrow. The jury usually brings community values, and perspective, and good sense. Nine out of ten juries might conclude that the playground equipment is reasonable, or that the car dealer is not liable for shutting off the airbags. But, who knows—maybe the next accident victim will get Johnnie Cochran on the case.

Let's look a little closer at why Americans are so scared. Being at risk of someone's self-interested value judgment feels far different from being at risk on a disputed fact. There's no way to disprove the claim. Each case boils down to a version of a playground spat: yes it is; no it isn't. Back and forth the lawyers go: the coffee is too hot; no, it's not. Doctors should order X rays for bad coughs; no, only if the cough persists. Where's the proof? It doesn't exist. You can't disprove a value judgment. It's just argument.

Does it seem to you that anyone can bring a claim for practically anything? They can. When justice turns on a value judgment, all anyone has to do is make up a theory. Nothing could be easier. Someone always could have done something differently. A canoe rental company on the Delaware River was found liable on the theory that it should have stationed lifeguards for miles along the riverbanks. Literally any harmful event can be a lawsuit, even being struck by lightning, as the city of Denver recently learned when sued by a golfer.

We call it "proving" a claim, but letting any private person make claims based on their own value judgments is basically allowing anybody to make up their own proposed rule, and then present it to a jury. It's like law à la carte. America is no longer a nation of laws, but an ad hoc plebiscite, applied retrospectively on whatever theory anyone cares to invent. The air is thick with law, but it's not law that judges and legislators decided makes sense. Like the weather, this new law is changeable from jury to jury. Even if you win, what about next time? Juries are amazingly effective at keeping their fingers in the dike. But does it make the doctor breathe easier that the chances of losing a baseless claim are only, say, one in twenty? Those are the odds of a test pilot, not a caregiver.

For years, litigation anxiety has been casting a darker cloud over ordinary choices. Even if you're not sued, what could someone dream up? Every few weeks we read about lawsuits over some previously accepted part of life, like soda pop or peanut butter. If America is based on a rule of law, how is it that new legal rights seem to be discovered at the pace of modern technology?

Most Americans probably believe that litigation has merely shifted to a new level that we tolerate in the name of individual rights. Without standards of what's reasonable and what's not, however, justice loses its footing. Claims become self-referential. Everyone else has a warning, why didn't you? Our fear becomes a substitute for law. Other schools don't allow touching children, why did your school? We wanted a system of justice based on proof, not anyone's personal beliefs. But our own anxiety is now supplying the proof. A gnat-sized theory makes otherwise sensible people turn tail. As soon as a few people start running, it's almost inevitable everyone else will. Billions of cautionary coffee cups, because of one jury verdict.

Nothing is sacred. In response to publicity about an unsuccessful litigation against a church after a parishioner committed suicide, churches have begun implementing policies discouraging counseling by ministers. Instead, parishioners are referred to psychologists and other therapists. The legal exposure to risk is too great, according to Reverend Charles Darwin, a minister at Park City's Baptist Church, an 8,500-member congregation in Dallas. "What I'm saying," said Reverend Glen Evans of Calvary United Methodist Church in Arlington, Virginia, "is that 'I'd like to see you, but I'm afraid you might sue me.'" When Michael and Theresa Dunne of San Diego sought counseling for marital problems, their church referred them to a therapist who advocated "leaving that God stuff outside the door." Reverend Darwin doesn't like it—"I don't really know what they're getting"—but feels safer diverting his parishioners to Freud than even thinking about possible legal liability.

Americans know opportunity when they see it. "An act is illegal," Professor Donald Black observed, "if it is vulnerable to legal action." Empowered by their own imagination, individuals with a certain predisposition grab hold of the magic cape of individual rights and fly over society, looking for someone who might be called to account for some accident or perceived grievance, or for whatever purpose suits them.

New industries are springing up to meet the demand. Vidal Herrera in Los Angeles pioneered 1-800-Autopsy. "Business is great," said Mr. Herrera, who has so much business that he tells prospective clients that autopsies are not generally necessary. "But so many people want to sue," he observed, "that they don't listen." One recent caller said that her ninety-two-year-old mother had been working in her garden two days before she died in a local hospital. On questioning, the daughter admitted that her mother was a smoker with diabetes, high blood pressure, and a variety of other ailments. But the daughter was insistent: "I think they killed her."

Approaching each disagreement as a matter of individual rights doesn't seem to bring out the best in anyone. The effect is more like stoking a bonfire. Believing in "an unattainable order of things," Vaclav Havel notes, people start trying to "confirm [their] identity by sounding off at others and demanding [their] rights." Whoever is asserting a right comes to believe it, and the sense of legal entitlement leads to bitter conflict.

Talk to principals. Parents, particularly in more affluent schools, often act like maniacs. Their anger is startling. One tried to run over a principal in a parking lot. The situation in Orange County, California, got so bad that the Capistrano Unified School District adopted a civility code, which can result in misdemeanor charges against parents who scream at school staff or use obscenities. This attitude of sometimes violent entitlement is apparently a reason the principals are quitting and retiring in record numbers. "We're no longer educators," said one. "We're legal targets."

Right and wrong, as practically everyone has noticed, are increasingly defined in legal terms, not moral ones. Reputation seems almost like a quaint concept, replaced by an analysis of individual legal rights, as if, Professor Mary Ann Glendon notes, we "roam at large in a land of strangers." But this new legalistic morality, once legal claims are understood as self-created, can be reduced to a more straightforward understanding. It's no morality at all.

A schizophrenic strain has crept into the society, with people edging around the baseboards, looking this way and that before doing anything in the common realm, but then, when they can, aggressively using law to gain a personal advantage. There's a "litigation neurosis," Chief Justice Warren Burger noted almost twenty years ago, developing "in otherwise normal, well-adjusted people." The wife of a doctor who is probably paranoid about legal liability doesn't hesitate to milk the system by suing his parents. Like savages, rather than citizens of a great civilization, we pounce when there's an opening and cower in our caves the rest of the time.

Americans are constantly told that justice purged of personal values is an essential condition of a diverse society, just part of a social structure that must accommodate different interests and values. We trudge along like self-flagellants repeating the mantra, "Who am I to judge?" But most Americans probably share basic values of social interaction, like not making unreasonable demands and being considerate of others. Perhaps the common mores of decency and proportion have eroded not because of diversity but because successive generations have learned what they can get away with. If people see others getting away with selfish conduct, they become cynical, and some become selfish themselves. We keep bending over backward to accommodate selfish and antisocial conduct, and then wonder why our social fabric is disintegrating.

THE ABDICATION OF LEGAL AUTHORITY

There was "a massive redefinition of freedom" in the 1960s, historian Eric Foner has observed, "as a rejection of all authority."

Our philosophy of individual rights sits high on a pedestal, bathed in the light of universal acceptance notwithstanding its corrosive effect on our culture, because it keeps authority at bay. The rhetoric of modern justice is individual rights, but its foundation is avoidance of authority. Americans can't stand the idea of some unknown jerk having the power to make decisions. With neutral justice, we don't have to give anyone authority to make choices for the common good. Almost subconsciously, we can't bring ourselves to confront the need for authority in a free society.

Avoiding authority has preoccupied legal reformers for the past half century. How to protect free citizens against abuses of authority was already an urgent topic among legal scholars coming out of the struggle against dictators in World War II. Then America's awakening on racism took center stage. In 1954, when the Supreme Court in Brown v. Board of Education overturned laws and court rulings supporting segregated education, it set off a chain reaction causing Americans to question their own beliefs. People in power could identify those who abused their authority by looking in the mirror. A national crisis of confidence turned up the heat on existing legal structures past their melting point.

Law lost its authority. We had been taught by judicial leaders like Benjamin Cardozo and Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., that law was supposed to support the mores of society, but the Brown decision turned the spotlight onto America's pervasively racist mores. We were taught to trust judges to do justice, but Brown exposed generations of judges who had been uniformly unjust to race. How could the Supreme Court possibly have sanctioned the "separate but equal" doctrine for over half a century? Who can trust judges? Most of the rest of Americans also tolerated segregation and second-class status for blacks. Can we trust ourselves? The self-doubt then turned toward the structure by which laws are made. What is law if the Supreme Court can simply reverse direction at the snap of a finger? The Brown opinion, viewed today as a ninety-year lag in enforcing the Fourteenth Amendment, relied on sociological facts of differences between black and white education. Where's the legal principle there?

In a famous 1959 article, "Towards Neutral Principles of Constitutional Law," Columbia law professor Herbert Wechsler agonized over the fact that Brown did not adhere to principle. Wechsler's article and the hubbub around it—literally hundreds of academic articles debated his call for "neutral principles"—were symptomatic of the broader crisis in authority that shook the mortar of our entire system of government.

Insulating state power from fallible human choices became the number one priority of legal reform. No error or bias could occur if officials no longer had discretion. For regulation, making law as precise as possible became the way to remove personal authority by government officials. The burgeoning regulatory state was constructed as a detailed instruction manual that admitted no human judgment. Every year, thousands of pages of detailed rules specified exactly what everyone had to do, like setting the height of factory railings at exactly forty-two inches. Regulators and factory managers walked around with their noses in the rule books, squinting at the fine print rather than trying to make sense of the particular situation. Pretty soon, the regulatory system began to function about as badly as the system of authoritarian central planning that everyone was trying to avoid.

But precise rules could not even try to address the infinite circumstances confronted by courts. How could we protect individuals against authority by judges? In an influential draft textbook, two Harvard law professors, Henry M. Hart and Albert M. Sacks, said that the central idea of justice should no longer be declaring rules of behavior but a "principle of institutional settlement." Judges would no longer decide right and wrong but would ensure instead a neutral process. "The first recourse of law in dealing with disputes," they said, "is not to seek final answers, but an agreeable procedure for getting an acceptable answer." To accommodate the "boundless and unpredictable variety" of views of a diverse society, the court should focus on the "greater importance of procedural arrangements."

Instead of looking to "considerations of social advantage," as Holmes had suggested, the new priority of law was to honor the right of each individual to make his argument. Judges lost their authority to interpret law on behalf of society. Legal philosopher H.L.A. Hart described the new individualistic philosophy this way: "The question is not 'maximization of . . . general welfare,' but a doctrine of basic human rights." Justice would be "content-neutral" and "transcend the conflict of particular views."

Diversity of belief, not uniformity of law, became the first goal of justice. In a 1957 decision, the Supreme Court admonished lower courts not to dismiss any claim unless "it appears beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to recover."

The first job of judges was to be beyond reproach, disregarding, to the extent possible, even their own beliefs: to bend over backward, and then bend over some more. Judges would safeguard a pristine process, and the decision would be made by a neutral decision maker, usually a jury of citizens picked at random. Deference to the jury, a right guaranteed by the Constitution, became how judges proved their neutrality. Judges basically ignored the Constitution's indication that in civil cases "the rules of the common law" override "fact[s] tried by a jury."

The cardinal sin for a judge was to make a decision just because the judge felt it was right. Perhaps the most ridiculed judicial statement of the period was by Justice Potter Stewart, reviewing a decision in Ohio under the First Amendment to ban Louis Malle's movie The Lovers. He said that "perhaps I could never succeed in intelligibly" defining pornography. "But I know it when I see it, and the motion picture involved in this case is not that."

"I know it when I see it" became a kind of joke in the legal academy, a shorthand catchphrase for everything law is not supposed to be. Belief was irrelevant, or worse, a synonym for bias. The point of justice, as Professor Michael Sandel put it, became to "respect people's freedom to choose their own values."

To our modern sensibility, giving someone authority to judge right and wrong is inconceivable. No mortal, we believe, should be able to assert rulings on behalf of the state. Federal judge Charles Wyzanski, one of the country's most respected trial judges, gave a lecture in 1973 in which he stated the prevailing gospel without a hint of doubt:

> Choosing among values is much too important a business for judges to do the choosing. That is something the citizens must keep for themselves.

Entire schools of legal academics are dedicated to explaining why judges have no basis to make decisions: They're not representative enough; they must make judgments only if "entirely rationalistic." Professor Paul Gewirtz summarizes the philosophy clearly: "Judicial power involves coercion over other people, and that coercion must be justified and have a legitimate basis." Justice is neutral, or it is not justice.

Americans did not intend to eliminate rules of fairness or reasonableness. We just didn't trust any human to make these choices. Americans do not distrust government as government, Robert Samuelson has noted. "They distrust concentrated power wherever it exists." Americans may be upset that we've lost our sense of right and wrong, but we know, as clearly as we know anything, that no one has the authority to decide right or wrong. The new authority, George Trow wrote in his 1981 essay "Within the Context of No Context," is "no authority."

Striving for neutrality, however, we unintentionally removed a critical element of justice. "Legal principle," Oxford philosopher P. S. Atiyah observed, has been "rejected as a form of authoritarianism."

FINDING LAW IN UNCOMFORTABLE PLACES

Baseball is a sport familiar to most Americans. Its rules are generally known, and so are its risks. The ball is batted in all kinds of unpredictable places by people swinging as hard as they can, and thrown at high velocity to make it difficult to hit or to cut down the runner. We love the game. It's our national pastime. So let's look at why justice seems to have a hard time dealing with the accepted risks of baseball.

When the center fielder didn't show for the Little League game, the coach moved the all-star second baseman, Joey Fort, to center field. In the third inning, a high fly came toward Joey, but Joey lost it in the sun. Usually with a runner in scoring position, the coach's next choices, as one reporter put it, include bringing in the infield or setting up a special play. But Joey was injured when the ball hit him in the eye, and the coach in this case ended up hiring a lawyer. Joey's parents sued for injuries he sustained. The theory was that Joey, who had never played center field, should have been instructed about catching fly balls in the sun or given flip-down sunglasses. The coaches ended up settling the case for $25,000.

Sister Gale Rawson was on second base in a softball game when a fellow teammate hit a single up the middle. It would be a close play, but Sister Gale decided to try to score. The relay came. The catcher blocked the plate, ready to tag Sister Gale as she barreled in. The inevitable collision occurred, and the catcher dropped the ball. Safe! Not quite. The catcher fell the wrong way and broke her leg. She sued. For what? Sister Gale didn't break the rules, nor did anyone else.

Getting hit by a fly ball is a common risk of baseball. So is a collision at home plate. These claims shouldn't get to first base, except maybe in a peculiar situation that's hard to imagine. There's a venerable legal principle right on point, called "assumption of risk": If the risks are well known, those are the breaks.

A legal principle by itself never quite resolves a case, however. You can practically feel the lawyer squirming his way out of it: "Joey Fort may have assumed the risk at second base, but he had never tried center field. Not once had he been instructed about judging long fly balls." We roll our eyes, but there in the courthouse sits Joey, one eye still blurry, looking pitiful. It's hard to blame Joey.

Try to find the law in this courtroom scene. There's the injured Joey and his angry parents, the nervous Little League coaches, living proof of the adage "no good deed goes unpunished"; and several lawyers engaging in a kind of hyperbole competition. The jury then receives this enlightening instruction from the judge:

> If you find that the plaintiff knew of the risk, and voluntarily decided to expose himself to it, then your verdict must be for the defendant. If you find from a preponderance of the evidence that the defendants were guilty of negligence which proximately caused the injustice to the plaintiff, you must find for him.

Now that's really helpful. The jury has no idea how to read between the lines. It must be a serious claim, if all those important people wearing suits, even one in a black robe, go on and on about it. What are the jurors supposed to do? They look at the bereft mother. The coaches could have been a little more careful.

Where's the law? The law hasn't actually changed. Common law principles, like assumption of risk, have been around for generations. Common wisdom has it that what has changed is our diverse culture. Victims are less likely to take it lying down. Jurors are more willing to give victims verdicts. That's the way justice should work. But no juror voted for the plaintiff. The case, like most, settled. Who wants to take the risk, however slight, of a huge verdict?

Hard cases make bad law, so the saying goes. But how about easy cases? We see the just result right in front of us: A fly ball is an ordinary risk of baseball. But like someone without hands, we can't grab hold of it. It used to be, as Justice Louis Brandeis once confidently observed, that only conduct on the edges created legal uncertainty, and lawyers could readily "tell clients where a fairly safe course lies." But we can no longer rely on our instincts of what's obvious. Today, any ordinary life event, even moving the second baseman to center field, could end up in a gut-wrenching trial.

Philosophy, to paraphrase Holmes, is only words. The same is true of law. Legal principles can be argued to mean anything. In Germany before World War II, judges used legal principles that had been applied fairly for generations to send innocent people to their deaths. Describing this phenomenon, Judge Richard Posner observed that he was struck by the "extraordinary plasticity of legal rhetoric, which enables a clever judge to find a plausible form of words to clothe virtually any decision, however barbarous."

Every day, in countless arguments in and out of court, Americans experience the reality that legal principles are just words. Concepts like reasonableness and assumption of risk have been argued beyond recognition. As often as not, the law is turned upside down. The manipulation is not by judges: we solved the problem of official prejudice by taking away judges' point of view. Law exists only in hand-to-hand combat between the parties. No one has any clue where they stand.

Words only mean what someone says they mean. "Rules," a famous judge once said, "travel in pairs." A fly ball in the sun to a new center fielder can be an unreasonable risk, or it can be an assumption of risk. Which one it is depends on a ruling by someone.

So who decides? The legislature could pass laws trying to catalog what is reasonable or not, and, at this point, legislative action is undoubtedly needed in some areas. But the law books are already so thick no one knows what's in them. They would burst if a law were added for every ordinary life event. Just imagine it: This legislative session, we'll take up the risks of fly balls. Next session, whether graduation caps can be thrown in the air.

Where else can we find meaning for law? We look around the courtroom. There's the judge sitting sort of lonely up on the bench. It must be boring, parked up there all day long. We conjure up the image, basically accurate, of an aging male type in a black robe reciting legal platitudes to an equally bored jury. There he sits, feeling half-guilty for being a male (four out of five judges), being white (ditto), getting a privileged education, and for, he's told constantly, his unavoidable prejudices that represent the views of almost no one who needs justice. For years he's leaned over backward as far as he could to avoid interjecting any personal beliefs. That's his role, so he's told. He must keep values out of it as much as possible. Law has to be neutral, not polluted by his views of right and wrong.

It might be too scary, but let's look at what could happen if the judge actually leaned forward and decided something. The judge dusts off his gavel and, interpreting the principle of assumption of risk in this case, makes a legal declaration: "A fly ball in the sun is an ordinary risk of baseball. Case dismissed." What happens? The case is over except for an appeal to make sure the decision isn't out of left field. The jury doesn't even show up. A declaration of law is pinned up on the scoreboard for all to see. Once a few more courts make similar declarations, in the common law system, people begin to feel comfortable that they know where they stand.

But how does a judge decide how to apply a legal principle? The judge knows that changing positions is part of the risk of baseball, that the argument about long fly balls is just splitting hairs. But how does the judge know? He just knows. The judge can't prove it, because it's a value judgment about the nature of the game. The judge believes, in other words, that other people believe it. To quote Cardozo, it's "not what I believe to be right. It is what I may reasonably believe that some other man of normal intellect and conscience might reasonably look upon as right."

Courts are usually criticized for what they make us do, such as activist decrees that, in the name of integration, forced children to be bused hours away from their neighborhoods. Almost no one worries about what courts don't do, or makes the connection to daily choices we no longer make. But how can Little League coaches feel comfortable unless they know a judge has authority to declare as a matter of law that fly balls or other foreseeable accidents are an accepted risk of society?

Maybe the judge deciding about fly balls wasn't so scary after all. But what keeps a judge from acting like the German judges under Hitler? The judge is subject to scrutiny for how he applies the principles. The judge is not, as Cardozo put it, "a knight errant roaming at will." He gives reasons, which are the "salutary disinfectant" against arbitrary choices. But the judge's reasons are not provable. There is no proof, because these decisions of law will always be value judgments. The judge's reasons simply allow an appellate court, or the court of public opinion, to evaluate the wisdom of the decision.

What happens if the judge decides the other way, holding that Little League coaches must take precautions to protect Little Leaguers against the sun? Everybody now knows we'd better stock up on sunglasses. Even if the rule is stupid, at least Americans know where we stand. Instead of coaching Little League, people start to go fishing.

Having no rules means that fear becomes the rule. In 1999, major-league baseball issued a directive to players that, when picking up a foul ball, they should no longer throw it to fans in the stands. There might be legal liability if someone were hurt trying to recover a souvenir. Most players, thankfully, are just ignoring the new policy. It's hard to blame MLB. Foul ball litigation is increasingly common. It's only a matter of time before the major league fields are completely screened off.

Chief Justice Roger Traynor of the California Supreme Court, a famous liberal innovator of the 1960s—he created the doctrine of strict liability for manufacturers whose products fail—emphasized the need for judges to declare rules even for the simplest accident, and not leave standards "to oscillating verdicts of juries." When a woman hit her head on an angled ceiling while walking down a staircase, Traynor insisted that the judge determine whether it was an unreasonable hazard: In that case, "the danger is so apparent that visitors could reasonably be expected to notice it." Holmes also was adamant that the judge make the value judgments presented by a case:

> Negligence . . . [is] a standard of conduct, a standard which we hold the parties bound to know beforehand, and which in theory is always the same upon the same facts and not a matter dependent upon the whim of the particular jury or the eloquence of the particular advocate.

Another renowned judge, Presiding Justice David W. Peck, in New York's Appellate Division, noted that a judge must be "mindful of the larger orbit than . . . the parties immediately before him." The judge, as Cardozo observed, must act as "the interpreter for the community of its sense of law and order."

Americans want a legal solution that's neutral, law that's served up exactly the same way everywhere, like a McDonald's Happy Meal. But no fast-law franchise exists to serve up, pre-prepared, what practically everyone knows is the right call: that a fly ball is an ordinary risk of baseball. No rule, as Wake Forest president Thomas Hearn observed, can "replace the judgment, which is required to apply principles . . . to the facts of the matter." To be effective as guides for society, legal principles must be applied as most people would expect them to be. Otherwise, law is so much hocus-pocus, and no one knows what to do.

This human stewardship of law will strike many as almost unlawful, but that's because, like most generations, we don't look to history.

THE MYTH OF TRANSCENDENT LAW

Giving authority to duly elected or appointed officials, it is useful to remember, was the organizing idea of the American Republic. The personal beliefs of these officials were considered not an evil but the essential currency of government for the Republic. Elected representatives, for example, were given fixed terms so that they would have the breathing room to act on their own personal beliefs. Their authority, in a system of separated powers, would then be checked by other officials' authority.

Personal authority for judges was similarly not considered a problem but a key part of the solution. The job of judges, as Hamilton put it in Federalist 83, was not to be neutral but to "interpret the laws" and "declare the sense of the law." That was the traditional role of judges in the common law system that we inherited from England, in which courts announce and interpret legal principles of social interaction. The meaning of those principles evolves over time like, as Judge Learned Hand put it, "a monument slowly raised, like a coral reef, from the minute accretions of past individual decisions."

Courts are our bastion of sanity in this constitutional system because they can take the long view, free from popular passion. To ensure their independence, federal judges were given lifetime tenure. Courts are like democracy in slow motion: Individuals of long tenure apply long-standing principles in the context of new cases and changing social needs.

In the early days of the Republic, judicial law making was not so slow. Judges immediately took the job of sorting out, under the Constitution, who had authority to do what. Did Congress have authority to establish a national bank? While the opinions of the Supreme Court in this period, like most judicial opinions, were written as if the conclusion were foreordained, these rulings were basically inventions by the remarkable individuals who were the chief justices of these courts: "It was Marshall, not law, who made the Constitution stand for nationalism. . . . It was Taney, not the writing on parchment, who made 'the police power' an instrument for control of the rising industrial system."

As the industrial revolution began transforming societal relationships, judges adapted the common law to an age of impersonal dealing. In an agrarian society, historian Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., notes in The Age of Jackson, social interactions had been "controlled by a feeling of mutual responsibility." New rules were obviously needed for a society made mobile by railroads and supplied by distant factories. A law of "contract" was invented which put emphasis on formal agreement rather than review of each agreement for fairness. The law of "negligence" was invented to resolve disputes over accidents with people who did not know each other.

The new rules generally reflected the laissez-faire bias of the times, or, as Holmes approvingly put it, that the "loss from accident must lie where it falls." One infamous rule was the "Fellow Servant Rule," which barred recovery to workers injured on the job by a co-worker's negligence. The logic, in the words of its creator, Chief Justice Lemuel Shaw of the Massachusetts Supreme Court, was that the worker "takes upon himself a natural and ordinary risk inherent in the assignment . . . for which he is adequately compensated."

These rules would not be considered fair today any more than a Model T would be considered safe. But they were rules of society, declared by judges who, Schlesinger observes about Chief Justice Shaw, "had a very real sense of the imperatives of change" and "the requirements of the community." In the common law tradition, these rules continued to evolve over time to meet changing realities and social values.

Law has always held itself out to have a transcendent quality better than just a bunch of people making it up. To maintain common respect for law, judicial rulings must indeed be "infuse[d] . . . with the glow of principle," as Cardozo observed, or they will not stand the test of time. But our longing for law that is immutable periodically causes law to rigidify, as judges and legislators adopt the "formalistic" approach of deciding based on abstract legal analysis instead of the purpose of the legal principle.

As the Civil War approached, the crisis over slavery drove judges toward formalism, in part as an excuse to ignore the purpose of laws. Judges like Lemuel Shaw, asked to return escaped slaves to their southern owners under the Fugitive Slave Act, found themselves in a moral dilemma.

Many, including Shaw, took the route of "seizing on minor technical lapses" to avoid enforcing the law. Judges, having reinvented law in the prior fifty years, began to take seriously again the idea that the words of law, not their own views of the law's purpose, marked the path to justice.

Formalism reached full bloom after the Civil War, when the mechanical age inspired legal thinkers to imagine that law was a "species of scientific truth" which judges discovered by careful study. Led by Christopher Columbus Langdell, the first dean of Harvard Law School, generations of late-nineteenth-century lawyers were trained to believe that any legal problem had only "one true answer": "In scientific law, the judge has no will, makes no value judgments." Although ridiculous in hindsight—a little skepticism surely must have crept into the minds of intelligent judges searching for "one true answer" in a close case—the power of accepted convention should never be underestimated. Judges flocked to scientific law in part because, in the words of Judge Richard Posner, it "shift[s] responsibility . . . to dead people." "The idea of a body of law fixed for all time and invested with an almost supernatural authority," as Professor Grant Gilmore put it, "is irresistibly attractive."

Formal law has a bad habit of elevating logic over good sense. During the reign of scientific law, a judge in Vermont dismissed a claim over a defective butter churn because, after exhaustive research, the judge could find no law specifically addressing butter churns. In 1928, Chief Justice William Howard Taft held that a wiretap on a telephone could not possibly be an unconstitutional search-and-seizure. Telephones did not exist when the Constitution was written. Professor Gilmore characterized Dean Langdell as an "essentially stupid man who pursued his one idea with the tenacity of a genius."

Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., started the movement toward a "realist" conception of justice when, in 1881, he famously declared, "[T]he life of the law has not been logic; it has been experience." A remarkable man whose brilliance was equaled almost by his longevity, Holmes began his career left for dead as a wounded lieutenant in the cornfields of Antietam in 1862. Over seventy years later, in 1933, he was still sitting on the Supreme Court. Holmes spent much of his career looking down on formalism of law as a parent might observe children playing, explaining why law had to weigh "considerations of social advantage," and why this was not inconsistent with the idea of legal principle.

The nadir of post–Civil War formalism came in the 1905 Lochner case when, over Holmes's dissent, the Supreme Court declared unconstitutional a statute designed to limit to ten hours the shift of bakers working next to hot ovens. In a triumph of formalist reasoning over practical reality, the Court declared the statute, designed to preserve worker health, conflicted with the worker's freedom to contract with his employer.

Holmes eventually succeeded in returning to legislatures power over health and safety. Benjamin Cardozo, who replaced Holmes on the Supreme Court, led the modernization of contract and tort law while the Chief Judge in New York State. Among other innovations, Cardozo abandoned the common law requirement of direct contract "privity" in order to expand duties of manufacturers to distant consumers. Until a Cardozo decision in 1923, for example, a car owner was barred from suing the manufacturer for defects causing an accident because the car, like all cars, had been bought through a dealer rather than directly from the maker.

Cardozo gave a series of lectures at Yale in the early 1920s in which he explained what judges a century earlier had taken for granted:

> The judge is under a duty . . . to maintain a relation between law and morals, between precepts of jurisprudence and those of reason and good conscience. "It is the function of courts to keep doctrines up to date with the mores by continual restatement. . . . This is judicial legislation, and the judge legislates at his peril. Nevertheless, it is the necessity and duty of such legislation that gives to judicial office its highest honor; and no brave and honest judge shirks the duty or fears the peril."

Holmes and Cardozo articulated the need for authority by judges that our founding fathers and their judicial appointees had assumed. But their famous wisdom was itself based on a critical assumption, largely unarticulated: Performing this role required a willingness to assert values of right and wrong. Even Dean Langdell believed that law should assert right and wrong; he just thought the choice preordained.

Every civilization has rules: Otherwise it wouldn't be civilized. Under our modern version of procedural formalism, striving for neutrality above all else, we no longer acknowledge that society needs rules which reflect a deliberate choice about what should be encouraged or discouraged. Giving someone authority to assert social values, even if accountable to us or to a higher authority, strikes us as practically totalitarian. Our neutral formalism shares Dean Langdell's goal of avoiding judicial authority, but it goes one giant step further; in the name of individual rights, it tries to avoid values altogether.

Neutrality is illusory, however. People will interact one way or another. Values don't disappear; they reflect the law. Law and social behavior are linked like birds in a migrating flock. One or the other can lead, but they must stay together. Too much or too little law can have roughly the same effect on society. If legal exposure expands too much, people start tacking warning signs all over the landscape and spend half their time worrying about possible defenses. Without adequate law, people huddle in fear or are abused, as with child labor during the industrial revolution. Some people will exploit whatever they can. That's why law is essential for freedom.

For law to be effective, Archibald Cox once observed, it "must meet the needs of men and match their ethical sensibilities" or, as Holmes put it, "correspond with the actual feelings and demands of the community." To Holmes, this was "the first requirement of a sound body of law."

But Americans no longer believe in belief. We've certainly come, or gone, a long way. Democracy used to be the vehicle by which America strove confidently toward the "perfectibility of man." "We don't expect to change human nature," reformer Jane Addams said shortly before her death, "but we do expect to change human behavior." It may well be, as many scholars suggest, that Americans no longer agree on right and wrong. But the absence of consensus only underscores the need for rules of interaction. How else do we know what's reasonable? Today, honoring neutrality, we're too insecure to tell someone trying to avoid work because of a paper cut to go get a Band-Aid instead.

Our founders would have been surprised. A Constitution designed to provide a government respecting common values is now invoked to avoid all values. Justice today is purposeless. Being purposeless is, indeed, its guiding purpose. The aim of modern justice, one scholar recently declared, is to elevate deliberations "to a level where power goes to the most persuasive." Justice has been reconceived as a kind of sporting contest. In Boston, the new federal courthouse is designed so that the bench is set only slightly above the floor. Judges are a part of a neutral process, just "part of the furniture" as Justice Stephen Breyer quipped. May the best lawyer win.

As with Dean Langdell's scientific justice, however, the steady deterioration of public confidence will require abandoning this hands-off approach. "How do we judge a wrong," William Bennett asks, "when we have gutted the concept of judgment itself?" Sooner or later, people have to be "empowered," as former Harvard president and law school dean Derek Bok suggested, "to keep watch and make sure the process as a whole is meeting the needs of society."

It may be "easier to conceal a diversity of values when principles are jettisoned in favor of individualized justice,"

DOJ_NMG_0142752

Professor Atiyah suggests: "But how long can this process of concealment last?"

To liberate citizens to act on their reasonable beliefs, judges must embrace a philosophy they've spent fifty years trying to repudiate, and start asserting values when interpreting rules. No issue in a case, not even how much people can claim, should be exempt from a judge's constant scrutiny.

I KNOW IT WHEN I SEE IT

In 1992, Dr. Ira Gore, a dentist in Birmingham, Alabama, bought a new BMW. He was so proud of it that, after a few months, he took it to a customized paint enhancer named Mr. Slick. There he learned the terrible truth, otherwise not visible, that the paint on his BMW had been touched up because of the effects of acid rain on its voyage across the Atlantic. Dr. Gore sued and was awarded not only damages for alleged reduction in value ($4,000) but also $4 million in punitive damages for this unbelievably outrageous conduct. The punitive damages were calculated, if that's the right term, based on Dr. Gore's argument that the jury should teach BMW a lesson by paying him another $4,000 for each of one thousand cars it had retouched in the prior decade.

The case found its way to the United States Supreme Court, whose decision was considered so noteworthy that it received front-page attention. By the tightest of margins, five to four, the Supreme Court overturned the award as "grossly excessive." The argument among the justices illustrates how far away our legal leaders are from asserting their beliefs of the legal principles that should govern our society. Justice Ginsburg's dissenting opinion accused her colleagues of a standardless decision, ridiculing their "raised eyebrow" test. Justice Ginsburg has a point. What kind of legal standard is "grossly excessive"? But why is the standard essentially standardless? Because punitive damages are inherently standardless. Why not $4 trillion?

The better question is not whether standardless judicial oversight is proper but why a rule of law tolerates wild, standardless assertions of damages. Going a step further, why in such a case should punitive damages be allowed at all? Touching up paint on a BMW is not a human rights abomination.

Making up a rule of law, whether to limit damages or to permit hot coffee, is an idea that is inconceivable to most judges today. Like a goldfish that has flopped out of its bowl, a judge asked to actually apply a legal principle is apt to gasp and feel helpless. He is used to swimming in legal process, and laying off the real-world responsibility of an actual verdict on jurors who come and go at random. It doesn't matter that the heroes of the judiciary like Holmes and Cardozo could hardly have been clearer.

In fairness, judges have always had a tendency to let claims go to the jury. When justice still labored under the fiction that law would be found under a holy grail, judges generally just let the jury find the grail. Avoiding responsibility, like avoiding risks, is a common human instinct. The judicial laissez-faire approach didn't much matter until recent decades, however, because people didn't bring lawsuits over fly balls or peanut butter. Social conventions—some for the better, some not—had the effect of limiting what people made claims for. But these social conventions, as we've seen, have broken down.

Today, almost any dispute involving an accident goes to the jury, even if the circumstances themselves are not disputed. But there's a huge difference in the impact of a jury resolving a disputed fact, like who ran the red light or who is telling the truth, and deciding the legal consequences of some ordinary activity, like whether seesaws are unreasonably hazardous. Disputed facts generally involve only the parties in the particular case. A verdict that a seesaw is unreasonably dangerous—indeed, just letting a claim go to a jury—will affect whether seesaws stay in playgrounds all across America. Letting the jury decide means that one person's claim will dictate national policy.

Damages are perhaps the area of greatest judicial deference to juries. How much a defendant should pay is certainly not a legal question. Ergo, by judicial consensus, it must be a fact question for the jury to decide. But even traditional factual issues can spin out of control until they affect society as a whole. Without judicial standards, justice has lost its credibility with society here as well.

Like weeds in a rainy spell, claims have grown ever larger over the past few decades. First it was millions that took our breath away, then tens of millions, then hundreds of millions. Now it's billions. Pretty soon, one lucky victim may own the world. Not even Huxley or Orwell imagined this would be our end.

The standard operating procedure for any aspiring litigant is to sue for the moon. A young professional at Morgan Stanley, fired after several infractions and embarrassments (including having his nude photo appear in a men's magazine and allegedly planting racist e-mails), predictably sued. It had to be racism, not that his nudie shots brought disrepute to the company, especially since the company had paid someone to try to get him to admit to the e-mails. How much did he sue for? A sum of $1.35 billion. You never know with hot buttons like race and homosexuality. Even a small percentage would tide him over until the next photo shoot.

A great thing about bringing lawsuits in modern America is that it's so easy to threaten the adversary's entire livelihood. One stroke of a finger on the lawyer's word processor, and damages go from $100,000 to $1,000,000. Three more keystrokes, and we're suing for a billion dollars. This is fun.

What kind of justice system is it that allows someone to make up an amount of money to demand? Is that a fact to be "found" by a jury? It doesn't even qualify as a value judgment, which at least is a conclusion based on facts. Damages claimed today are completely arbitrary. Just stick your finger in the air and threaten someone with any number that comes to mind.

Judges treat damage claims almost as if they are property, and only with greatest reluctance intercede. In 1987, five-year-old Gregory Strothkamp climbed up several shelves to the top of the linen closet, got an unopened box of Q-Tips, and, while trying to use them, punctured his eardrum. His parents sued the maker of Q-Tips for, among other things, $20 million in punitive damages. Whatever the merits of the argument that Q-Tips should come in childproof packaging (which would raise everyone's cost), most people probably agree that making Q-Tips is not an evil act. When the jury awarded young Gregory $20 million in punitive damages, the judge did what was obvious from the beginning and overturned the award.

The claim ended sensibly, but is this how justice should work? Sweating through trial and verdict to get to obvious justice, while the judge is sitting there the whole time, doesn't exactly instill confidence in the system. Do judges enjoy watching the Q-Tips company, or a Little League coach, or a doctor squirm on the end of a multi-million-dollar hook?

Lying dormant along the side of society is another important legal principle: that a person injured should be "made whole" by damages. Traditionally, this meant out-of-pocket losses, like lost wages or medical bills. In an unusual case, like a homemaker with no wages, claims were permitted in categories not actually calculable, like "pain and suffering." In cases of genuine evil, punitive damages were possible. Today the exceptions have engulfed the rule, with all kinds of side effects. Juries are regularly asked "to assume the baffling task of trying to place a monetary value on pain and suffering," Dean Bok observed, "although the predictable result [is] to encourage a rise in litigation and the growth of the most unsavory and deceptive practices."

Judges might concede the principle but can't imagine how to apply it; they need some objective legal post to hang on to. If $1.35 billion is too much, what is the right amount? The "exercise of judicial power is not legitimate," as one scholar put it, "if it is based on a judge's personal preference rather than law." So what do the judges do? They abdicate. Judges look up at the allegorical figure of Justice and interpret her blindfold as impotence.

But Justice is also holding balanced scales. How does Justice achieve balance but through the values and wisdom of judges? Proportion is critical to justice. Equals should be treated alike, Aristotle believed, and unequals proportionally to their relative differences: "the unjust is what violates the proportion." These distinctions, Aristotle observed, can only be made with human wisdom.

Dead people can be so smart. "[T]o speak somewhat paradoxically," Cardozo observed, there are times "when nothing less than a subjective measure will satisfy an objective standard." Justice Potter Stewart had it right after all. Judges have to know it when they see it. One billion dollars for a wrongful dismissal case is absurd. Everyone knows it. The case should be dismissed unless the plaintiff comes back with some amount he can plausibly justify.

I wonder if judges ever ask themselves why it is that damage claims have escalated to a level where they are like a parody of a dysfunctional system of justice. The answer couldn't be more obvious. Judges sit on their hands and tolerate claims that make lotteries seem like small change. The reason people bring huge claims is not hard to divine: It's a form of extortion. Why else sue for such ridiculous amounts? Being sued for, say, $5 million for a regular accident may not cause you to fold your hand, but the possibility of ruin never strays far from your consciousness. Most million-dollar claims end up settling for thousands or less. But not all. All that it takes is for a jury to get mad. . . .

At this point in the discussion, all those black robes are rising up like a human wave in a baseball stadium, hands raised in collective powerlessness. Who are they to judge? Let's respond with a question. What gives a private individual the unilateral right to invoke the court's power to coerce someone else?

I can hear the next one coming. Judges aren't supposed to be activist. For decades, judges have indeed been criticized for being too activist. The federal court in Boston caused riots when it forced children to be bused hours away from home. The federal court in Kansas City took over the school system, spending almost $2 billion to little or no effect. Like dinner-party dilettantes, judges weighed in on legislative-type judgments where they had little responsibility and less wisdom. At the same time, courts across the land were deferring to ludicrous claims by private individuals. This apparent judicial inconsistency is only superficial. Both share a common foundation of abdicating to a system of individual rights. An individual has the right to trial by jury. Don't interfere. An individual has the right to go to school in an integrated setting. Turn the city upside down. Anything in the name of individual fairness. Nothing for the common good.

Judicial activism has a bad name. Experience teaches us that judges should be loath to take over management of government. But judges have a responsibility on behalf of free society to assert standards of reasonable behavior and to prevent the power of justice from being used by private parties as a form of extortion. That's their role in our constitutional system.

THE RISKS OF JUSTICE

At a reception at the White House on April 13, 1906, honoring the formation of the Playground Association of America (Theodore Roosevelt, honorary president; Jacob Riis, honorary vice president), it was clear the association's purpose was not to amuse children. Playgrounds would divert children away from the temptation and dangers of urban streets, but their main purpose was to help children prepare for the challenges, opportunities, and risks of life. The founders were trying to create "a new equilibrium . . . between individualism and cooperation, initiative and caution."

Even the simplest playground equipment, like seesaws, was intended to cultivate both a "sense of balance and a certain feeling of responsibility." Rowland Haynes, who led the playground movement in Milwaukee beginning in 1911, stressed that team games were even more important; they would help children "build up habits of quick thinking, initiative in dealing with new situations, self-control [and] the ability to work with others in the give-and-take of group activities." Baseball was considered an ideal activity for child development. As Henry Curtis, one of the founders of the playground movement, put it:

> One boy is on first, and another is on second. A fielder gets a liner in the middle field. Shall he throw the ball to first, or second, or third? Shall he try to touch the runner and make a double play? He must decide in a quarter of a second > and act upon that decision instantly or he will never make a successful player. If his judgment is right, handkerchiefs are waved and he is generously applauded; if he makes a mistake, he is hissed and called a fool. . . . The game imparts to the mind an alertness and vivacity which are essential to any large success either in business or society.

For generations, this was the prevailing approach to healthy child development. John F. Kennedy's Council on Youth Fitness promoted the installation of monkey bars and other climbing equipment to develop children's strength and coordination.

The risks in these games were readily acknowledged, but, common sense told us, children were going to do something with all that energy, so why not make it worthwhile: "Children have always run and jumped and climbed, thrown and fended missiles, and played games. Play is the essential spirit of childhood and uses all things as its implements. Any equipment that is furnished can never be more than an incident to it."

No one supported activities with hidden dangers, such as the placement of a swing where it might strike unsuspecting passersby. But, as one of leaders of the movement wrote in 1917:

> It is reasonably evident that if a boy climbs on a swing frame and falls off, the school board is no more responsible for his action than if he climbed into a tree or upon the school building > and falls. There can be no more reason for taking out play equipment on account of such an accident than there would be for the removal of the trees or the school building.

Lady Allen of Hurtwood, a leader of the playground movement in Britain, dealt with the risks in a typically English way: "Better a broken arm than a broken spirit."

Fast-forward to today. Reading the pamphlets on safe playgrounds produced by the federal government and others, it's amazing any of us survived to adulthood. As a brochure from the National Program for Playground Safety states: "Many of today's adults remember hours of fun and adventure spent on the playgrounds of their childhood. But, all too often, these memories are mixed with pain." The dangers of play include earth itself, not only under climbing apparatus, but almost everywhere. A federal handbook advises: "Earth surfaces such as soils and hard-packed dirt are not recommended because they have poor shock-absorbing properties." Grass and turf are undesirable because "wear and environmental conditions can reduce their effectiveness." Seesaws are not explicitly condemned, but reading between the lines, no prudent person would keep them: "Seesaw use is quite complex because it requires two children to cooperate and combine their actions." As a result, "there is a trend to replace [them] with spring-centered seesaws."

In 1993 a boy climbed to the top of a jungle gym in Detroit, jumped off, and broke his leg. One mother, after hearing of the accident, went on a crusade, finding virtually everywhere older equipment and an "almost total lack of fall zones"—"all they had was hard-packed earth." She brought the dangers to the attention of all the schools, which, confronted with notice of a possible legal risk, jumped out of the way quicker than if a pitcher had thrown a beanball. How did they correct the problem? By removing fifty-four pieces of playground equipment.

Our modern goal is not to train children for life, including its risks, but simply to get rid of risk. New York City cut the limbs of trees near playgrounds so children would not be tempted—just the thought makes the heart flutter—to climb a tree. A school district in Southern California banned all running on school grounds. After all, someone might slip and fall. Who would be responsible then? A few years ago, to avoid perils of children interacting, a school district in Philadelphia banned recess altogether. How far can we go? Ban playing? How about children? W. C. Fields may have been onto something.

Focusing too hard on avoidance of risk, as the late Aaron Wildavsky tried to teach us, is calculated to increase the risks. Sooner or later you pay the price. Every opportunity—including safety itself—carries a risk. Safe playground equipment is boring, so children start playing dangerous games "that exceed the design limitations." Why would a five-year-old child be so interested in Q-Tips that he would climb up to the top of a closet in search of them? It turned out, although the fact was given no significance by the court, that the mother was so fastidious that she cleaned the child's ears several times a week. There is, as we know, pleasure in this activity. The opportunity carried a risk. In 1999, a mother sent a three-year-old to play on the playground and, to be safe, made sure the child wore a bicycle helmet. Tragically, the child broke his neck and died when the helmet was caught in a ladder. Risk can never be eliminated. Risk must always be judged against the opportunity.

Like playgrounds, the American system of justice also is subject to the calculus of risk and opportunity. Avoiding authority, for example, carries the opportunity of reducing personal bias and prejudice. How much is hard to say, because someone driven to a certain result, whether out of hate or influence of popular opinion, is apt to figure out a plausible way of getting there. But avoiding authority, as we've seen, also carries high risk. As Professor Robert Kagan put it:

> The spirit of distrust of authority . . . can be used against the trustworthy, too. An equal opportunity weapon, it can be invoked by the misguided, the mendacious, and the malevolent, as well as by the mistreated.

Cardozo agreed that a judge, no matter how hard he tries, can never "eliminate altogether the personal measure of the interpreter," but understood that society can't function without a ruling by someone:

> You may say there is no assurance that judges will interpret the mores of their day more wisely and truly than other men. I am not disposed to deny this, but in my view it is quite beside the > point. The point is rather that this power of interpretation must be lodged somewhere.

Americans hate the idea of a single person of uncertain predisposition having authority to make rulings. Justice will never be perfect, Cardozo observed, but believed that judges who "act with conscience and intelligence . . . ought to attain . . . a fair average of truth and wisdom." Is it better to have no rulings? With no one in authority to defend reasonable conduct, it is difficult for anyone in society to be reasonable. Larck Lake in West Virginia, closed for over five years, can offer tranquillity and enjoyment, but only if someone on behalf of society is able to accept the risk that someone may be foolish in their use of it.

We say we honor the rule of law, not authority based on beliefs. Imagine, we're taught, what a madhouse that would be. In all the braying about neutral justice, however, I don't recall much discussion about what people think makes sense as a legal rule for, say, playgrounds.

We have the idea of justice backward. Is justice about avoiding our beliefs in the name of neutrality, or about asserting common beliefs in the name of law? We keep looking for some way of proving correctness or, as Havel puts it, "an objective way out of the crisis of objectivism." But nothing important in human affairs is provable. Law certainly can't be proved. Law isn't even supposed to be provable. We "cannot be fair," Professor Lon Fuller once noted, "in a moral and legal vacuum." Principles of law should be based not on what we can prove but on what we believe. That's what law is: our beliefs on the rules of society, memorialized in common law principles and statutes and then, equally important, applied by judges who have the authority to make sense of them in accord with our beliefs. Belief isn't evil. What we believe is who we are.

The risk presented by belief is the risk of our own character: to distinguish right from wrong, to be tolerant, to be vigilant of those we give responsibility to. Taking risks used to define our national character. That's how we get anywhere. Whether in business, in personal relationships, or in justice, risk is a key component of life. Today in America, risk is also an evil concept. "You took a risk" is reason enough to get sued. Our pioneer forefathers, given a glimpse of the future as they set out across the plains in their Conestoga wagons, would have been shocked at their American descendants going through life scared of their shadows.

Only a society as wealthy and well meaning as ours could have come up with a philosophy so completely disconnected from reality. In a fit of self-indulgence, future historians will observe, Americans abandoned their self-confidence. Will Rogers once observed that Americans thought they were getting smarter because "they're letting lawyers instead of their conscience be their guide." Maybe what we need is not better leaders, but to look instead to our humorists.

The leader of the legal process movement, Professor Henry Hart, in one of his last classes at Harvard Law School, brought in a judge's decision that, contrary to ideals of neutral process, blocked local officials from prosecuting sit-in demonstrators in Little Rock. As everyone waited for the "devastating critique of which he was capable," Hart paused and finally said, "Sometimes, sometimes; you just have to do the right thing." Actually, that's what we're supposed to do all the time. Will Rogers could have told him that right at the start.

As it happens, Will Rogers came from Oologah, Oklahoma. What a field day he would have had with the removal of the double slide.

American Legal Exceptionalism

Everywhere in the modern world legal control of social, political, and economic life is intensifying (Galanter, 1992; Dewees et al., 1991). Law grows from the relentless pressures of technological change, geographic mobility, global economic competition, and environmental pollution—all of which generate social and economic disruption, new risks to health and security, new forms of injustice, and new cultural challenges to traditional norms. Some citizens, riding the waves of change, demand new rights of inclusion, political access, and economic opportunity. Others, threatened by change, demand legal protection from harm and loss of control. Democratic governments pass laws and issue judicial rulings responsive to both sets of demands (Schuck, 2000: 42; Kagan, 1995).

In some spheres of activity, such as land use regulation and worker protection, Western European polities typically have more restrictive laws than does the United States. Compared to the United States, Japan has a more detailed and extensive set of legally mandated product standards and premarketing testing requirements (Edelman, 1988: 292; Vogel, 1990). Germany has stricter recycling regulations and much tighter legal restrictions on the opening and operating of new retail enterprises (Davis and Gumbel, 1995). Compared to most American states, Sweden has tougher laws, and tougher law enforcement, concerning fathers' obligations to provide child support. The Netherlands regulates how much manure a farmer can spread on his fields (Huppes and Kagan, 1989: 215) and, like Germany, has more stringent emission standards than the United States for some major air pollutants (Rose-Ackerman, 1995: 27–28). An increasing number of nations, as well as the European Union, now have active constitutional courts, supporting Torbjorn Vallinder's (1995: 13) claim of a worldwide trend toward the "judicialization of politics," defined as "(1) the expansion of the province of courts or the judges at the expense of politicians and/or the administrators . . . or . . . (2) the spread of judicial decision making methods outside the judicial province proper."

The United States, however, has a unique legal "style." That is the message of an accumulating body of careful cross-national studies, such as those listed in Table 1. Each study examines a specific area of public policy, law, or social problem-solving in the United States and at least one other economically advanced democracy. The studies focus not merely on the formal law but on how the law is implemented in practice. Cumulatively, the studies compare national systems for compensating injured people, regulating pollution and chemicals, punishing criminals, equalizing educational opportunity, promoting worker safety, discouraging narcotics use, deterring malpractice by police officers, physicians, and product manufacturers, and so on. For one social problem after another, the studies show, the American system for making and implementing public policy and resolving disputes is distinctive. It generally entails (1) more complex bodies of legal rules; (2) more formal, adversarial procedures for resolving political and scientific disputes; (3) more costly forms of legal contestation; (4) stronger, more punitive legal sanctions;[1] (5) more frequent judicial review of and intervention into administrative decisions and processes;[2] (6) more political controversy about legal rules and institutions; (7) more politically fragmented, less closely coordinated decisionmaking systems; and (8) more legal uncertainty and instability.

Comparative studies are hardly necessary, moreover, to show that in no other democracy is litigation so often employed by contestants in political struggles over the delineation of electoral district boundaries, the management of forests, the breakup of business monopolies, the appropriate funding level for inner-city versus suburban public schools, or the effort to discourage cigarette smoking. In no other countries are the money damages assessed in environmental and tort suits nearly so high, or have major manufacturers been driven into bankruptcy by liability claims, or have disagreements over tort law generated such intense interest group clashes in the legislatures. Notwithstanding the aggressive prosecution of governmental corruption by Italian and French magistrates, the United States leads the league of nations in the extent to which political parties' struggles for political advantage regularly include investigations and prosecutions arising from charges that the chief executive, his aides, cabinet members, or legislators have committed criminal violations (Ginsburg and Shefter, 1990). The United States has by far the world's largest cadre of special "cause lawyers" seeking to influence public policy and institutional practices by means of innovative litigation. In no other country are lawyers so entrepreneurial in seeking out new kinds of business, so eager to challenge authority, or so quick to propose new liability-expanding legal theories. Finally, referring merely to the last few years, the United States is remarkable in its propensity to stage highly publicized, knock-down-drag-out legal donnybrooks such as the investigation and impeachment trial of President Bill Clinton, the custody battle over the six-year-old Cuban refugee Elian Gonzales, the antitrust cases against Microsoft, and the multicourt battle over Florida's votes in the 2000 presidential election—struggles that inject huge televised doses of politicized legal argument into the nation's everyday experience.

What Is Adversarial Legalism?

All these legal propensities are manifestations of what I call "adversarial legalism"—a method of policymaking and dispute resolution with two salient characteristics. The first is formal legal contestation—competing interests and disputants readily invoke legal rights, duties, and procedural requirements, backed by recourse to formal law enforcement, strong legal penalties, litigation, and/or judicial review. The second is litigant activism—a style of legal contestation in which the assertion of claims, the search for controlling legal arguments, and the gathering and submission of evidence are dominated not by judges or government officials but by disputing parties or interests, acting primarily through lawyers. Organizationally, adversarial legalism typically is associated with and is embedded in decisionmaking institutions in which authority is fragmented and in which hierarchical control is relatively weak.

These defining features of adversarial legalism have two characteristic consequences. The first is costliness—litigant-controlled, adversarial decisionmaking tends to be particularly complex, protracted, and costly. The second is legal uncertainty—when potent adversarial advocacy is combined with fragmented, relatively nonhierarchical decisionmaking authority, legal norms are particularly malleable and complex, and legal decisions are particularly variable and unpredictable. It is the combination of costliness and legal uncertainty that makes adversarial legalism especially fearsome and controversial.

Table 2 contrasts adversarial legalism with other modes of policy implementation and dispute resolution.[3] The horizontal dimension refers to legal formality—the extent to which contending parties or interests, as well as government officials, invoke and insist on conformity to written legal procedures and preexisting legal rights and duties. At one end of the informal-formal continuum, policy elaboration and dispute resolution can be labeled legalistic, in the sense that they are controlled by formal legal rules and procedures rather than by discretionary judgment, bargaining, and informal processes. (This definition encompasses, but is broader than, the common use of "legalism" to refer only to mechanical or rigid adherence to legal rules.)[4]

The vertical dimension of Table 2 concerns the extent to which the implementation or decisionmaking process is hierarchical—dominated by an official decisionmaker, applying authoritative norms or standards—as opposed to participatory—that is, influenced by disputing parties and their lawyers, their normative arguments, and the evidence they deem relevant. Taking each of these dimensions to their extreme form produces four "ideal types."

Negotiation/Mediation

A process in the lower left quadrant of Table 2 is adversarial in the sense that it is dominated by the contending parties, not by an authoritative governmental decisionmaker. But it is informal or nonlegalistic, since neither procedures nor normative standards are dictated by formal law. One example would be dispute resolution via negotiation, with or without lawyers; another would be policymaking by means of bargaining among politicians representing contending factions. The quadrant would also include mediation, whereby an "official" third party attempts to induce contending parties to agree on a policy or settlement but refrains from imposing a settlement based on law or official policy.

Expert/Political Judgment

The more an official decisionmaker or institution (as opposed to the contending interests) controls the process and the standards for decision, and the more authoritative and final the institution's decisions are, the more "hierarchical" the process. As suggested by the upper left quadrant in Table 2, hierarchical processes can be legally informal. For example, in many Western European countries decisions concerning eligibility for disability benefits and the extent of workers' compensation benefits are made by a panel of government-appointed physicians (or a mixed panel of physicians and social workers) without significant probability of intensive judicial review. In Japan disputes over fault in motor vehicle accidents typically are resolved by special traffic police who rush to the scene, question the parties, "hammer out a consensual story as to what happened," and file a detailed report on their findings (Tanase, 1990: 651, 673–674).

Bureaucratic Legalism

A policy-implementing or decisionmaking process characterized by a high degree of hierarchical authority and legal formality (the upper right quadrant of Table 2) resembles the ideal-typical bureaucratic process as analyzed by Max Weber. Governance by means of bureaucratic legalism emphasizes uniform implementation of centrally devised rules, vertical accountability, and official responsibility for fact-finding. The more hierarchical the system, the more restricted the role for legal representation and influence by affected citizens or contending interests. In contemporary democracies the pure case of bureaucratic legalism usually is softened in some respects, but it is an ideal systematically pursued, for example, by tax collection agencies. Also tending toward this ideal are German and French courts, where bureaucratically recruited and embedded judges—not the parties' lawyers and not lay juries—dominate both the evidence-gathering and the decisionmaking processes (Langbein, 1994). Similarly, in contrast to American criminal prosecutors' offices, in which individual assistant district attorneys usually make their own judgments about which charges to make and bargain with defense counsel about how much to reduce them in return for guilty pleas, prosecutors in Japan are subject to detailed rules and close hierarchical supervision concerning the investigation of facts, determination of the proper charge, and the recommendation of penalties (Johnson, 1998).

Adversarial Legalism

The lower right quadrant of Table 2 includes policy-implementing and decision processes that are procedurally formalistic but in which hierarchy is weak and party influence on the process is strong. American methods for compensating victims of highway and medical accidents, for example, prominently include a decentralized and adversarial tort law system driven by claimants and their lawyers, as contrasted with Western European compensation systems, which operate primarily through social insurance or benefit-payment bureaucracies. In American civil and criminal adjudication, the introduction of evidence and invocation of legal rules are dominated not by the judge (as in Europe) but by contending parties' lawyers. Even in comparison with the British "adversarial system," hierarchical, authoritative imposition of legal rules is relatively weak in the United States (Atiyah and Summers, 1987).

From a comparative perspective, American judges are more political, their decisions less uniform (Levin, 1972: 193–221; Rowland and Carp, 1983: 109–134). Law is treated as malleable, open to parties' novel legal arguments and pleas of extenuating circumstances. Lay jurors, whose decisions are not explained and largely shielded from hierarchical review, still play an important role in the American system, which reduces legal certainty and magnifies the influence of skillful legal advocacy.

Similarly, compared to European democracies, regulatory decisionmaking in the United States entails many more legal formalities—complex legal rules concerning public notice and comment, restrictions on ex parte and other informal contacts with decisionmakers, legalistically specified evidentiary and scientific standards, mandatory official "findings" and responses to interest group arguments. These legal devices facilitate interest group participation and judicial review of administrative decisions. But hierarchical authority is correspondingly weak. Policymaking and implementing authority is often shared by different agencies at the same or at different levels of government, with different interests and perspectives. Agency decisions are frequently challenged in court by dissatisfied parties and reversed by judges, who dictate further changes in administrative policymaking routines. Lawyers, scientists, and economists hired by contending industry and advocacy groups play a large role in presenting evidence and arguments. Overall, the clash of adversarial argument has a larger influence on decisions than in other countries' regulatory systems, where policy decisions are characterized by a combination of political and expert judgment and consultation with affected interests (Badaracco, 1985; Brickman et al., 1985).

No modern democratic legal system is characterized entirely by any of the quadrants in Table 2. National legal styles are not monolithic; ways of making, invoking, and enforcing law vary within nations (especially within the United States) and even across offices of the same legal institution. British libel law is more threatening to the press than American libel law, which has been restricted by judicial interpretations of the First Amendment (Weaver and Bennett, 1993). The German Constitutional Court, interpreting a more recent and detailed constitution than the U.S. Constitution, has been more activist than the U.S. Supreme Court in some important policy areas, thereby stimulating a good deal of constitutional litigation (Currie, 1990; Landfried, 1995: 113). Adversarial legalism can and does occur in more "cooperation"-oriented nations, such as the Netherlands and Japan (Niemeijer, 1989: 121–152; Upham, 1987). Privatization, deregulation, intensified economic competition, and the advent of transnational regulation by the European Union and the European Court of Justice all have increased the role of courts and litigation in the governance of European countries (Kagan, 1997a).

Conversely, Americans often refrain from and disparage adversarial legalism. Contrary to one popular belief, ordinary people often do not demand tougher laws, prosecutions, and lawsuits for every kind of offense.[5] Research indicates that accident victims, disappointed purchasers, and regulatory inspectors who encounter violations generally do not resort to lawsuits as their first recourse (Hensler et al., 1991; Miller and Sarat, 1981; Bardach and Kagan, 1982). They often are willing to submit to bureaucratic or expert judgment or negotiate solutions to their legal claims. Politicians and legal elites often devise less adversarial, less costly alternatives to adversarial litigation—juvenile courts, family courts, small claims courts, workers' compensation tribunals, commercial arbitration, mandatory mediation, negotiated regulatory rulemaking and compliance plans, and so on.

American judges and legislatures periodically issue rulings and enact statutes that are designed to discourage lawsuits and appeals; the 1980s and 1990s saw a wave of such efforts to dampen adversarial legalism. Moreover, in social arenas in which the processes of adversarial legalism often are invoked, full-scale legal contestation usually does not occur, largely because the extraordinary costs and delays associated with formal adversarial litigation impel most disputants to negotiate an informal plea bargain or settlement—even if it means abandoning valid claims or defenses (Feeley, 1979; Macaulay, 1979). Thus it is helpful to think of "adversarial legalism" as encompassing both a method of policy implementation and dispute resolution (characterized by a set of legal institutions, rights, and rules that facilitate or encourage adversarial, party-dominated legal contestation) and the day-to-day practice of adversarial legal contestation, a practice whose rate or incidence varies over time and across settings, depending on the motivations and resources of potential disputants. In principle and in practice, institutionalizing the methods or structures of adversarial legalism—that is, establishing the kinds of judiciaries, legal rules, and law firms that facilitate adversarial litigation—does not completely determine how often conflicting parties actually use those institutions.

Yet viewed in comparative perspective, the United States is distinctive in both dimensions. It is especially inclined to authorize and encourage the use of adversarial litigation to implement public policies and resolve disputes. And according to the comparative studies of particular policy fields listed in Table 1, adversarial legalism as a matter of day-to-day practice is far more common in the United States than in other democracies.[6] Furthermore, adversarial legalism as a matter of day-to-day practice is far more common in the United States today than it was thirty-five or forty years ago.

The dual aspect of adversarial legalism—as decisionmaking structure or method and as day-to-day practice—is crucial to understanding its social consequences. It means that adversarial legalism's importance cannot be measured by litigation or adjudication rates alone, any more than the significance of nuclear weapons rests on the frequency of nuclear war. For example, even if only a small minority of aggrieved persons or organizations actually file lawsuits that result in jury trials, the mere threat of costly and potentially punitive adversarial litigation can deter malpractice by hospitals, business organizations, and governmental bodies. Even if only a small percentage of those who object to new waste disposal facilities challenge the permits in court, and even if only a handful of businesses mount legal appeals against new regulations, the legal rules and practices that facilitate such adversarial legal actions matter a great deal because the governmental officials who formulate solid-waste permits and new regulations cannot predict either the incidence or the outcomes of such actions. Because its structures always stand ready to be mobilized, adversarial legalism—lawyer-dominated, potentially costly contestation—is a barely latent, easily triggered potentiality in virtually all contemporary American political, economic, and administrative processes. It creates a set of incentives and expectations that have come to loom very large in American governmental, commercial, and social life.

The Roots of Adversarial Legalism

In the most immediate sense adversarial legalism is a product of American legal culture. In most other nations, legal elites place great emphasis on legal consistency and stability. Law is viewed as a set of authoritative rules and principles, carefully worked out over time. In the United States, in contrast, law is more often viewed as the malleable (and fallible) output of an ongoing political battle to make the law responsive to particular interests and values. Many, perhaps most, American lawyers, judges, legal scholars, and politicians (many of whom are lawyers) see adversarial litigation as a vital tool for righting wrongs, curtailing governmental and corporate arbitrariness, and achieving a just society. Every working day, American lawyers talk about law, legal ethics, and legal processes in ways that reemphasize those values—and American lawyers work unusually long days.

But there is a competing strain in American legal culture. Many lawyers, judges, law professors, and politicians disparage and discourage adversarial legalism. They work hard at promoting compromise and encouraging cooperation. They believe in judicial restraint, not activism. Moreover, judges and lawyers who do favor the institutions, rules, and practices of adversarial legalism, even if they are in the ascendance at a particular political moment, cannot work their will, at least for very long, without the support or acquiescence of other political elites and ultimately of the voting public (Peltason, 1955). The deeper roots of adversarial legalism, therefore, derive from broader American political traditions, attitudes, structural arrangements, and interest group pressures.

Students of comparative politics have long observed that in relation to other economically advanced democracies, the United States "has a strong society but a weak state"(Krasner, 1978: 61). Among the rich democracies, American government is the most easily penetrated by organized interest groups and extracts less tax revenue as a proportion of gross national product (Steinmo, 1993; Wilensky, 1975). In a comparative analysis of political cultures, Seymour Martin Lipset (1996: 21) writes that due to its long-standing emphasis on individualism and mistrust of government, "America began and continues as the most antistatist, legalistic, and rights-oriented nation." American government, accordingly, is designed to fragment and limit power. Both the federal and the state constitutions subject governmental power to crosscutting institutional checks and judicially enforceable individual rights. Thus, in comparison with most other economically advanced democracies, the national government in the United States shares more power with states and municipalities, and at every level of government chief executives share more power with legislatures, legislative party leaders with subcommittee chairs and back-benchers, administrative agencies with judges, and judges with lawyers and juries. A decentralized financial system, rooted in autonomous equity markets, deprives the American government of direct controls over the economy that, for good or for ill, many governments elsewhere in the world employ (Levy, Kagan, and Zysman, 1998).

A structurally fragmented state is especially open to popular and interest group demands. And in contemporary societies—far richer, better informed, and with higher expectations than any in human history—citizens demand a great deal of their government. They want and expect justice, economic security, and protection from harmful technologies and pollutants. They want and expect guaranteed health care and financial aid when disability, disaster, or unemployment strikes their families. But getting those things from an institutionally fragmented, tax-averse, "antistatist" political system, as in the United States, presents a problem.

American adversarial legalism, therefore, can be viewed as arising from a fundamental tension between two powerful elements: first, a political culture (or set of popular political attitudes) that expects and demands comprehensive governmental protections from serious harm, injustice, and environmental dangers—and hence a powerful, activist government—and, second, a set of governmental structures that reflect mistrust of concentrated power and hence that limit and fragment political and governmental authority.

Adversarial legalism helps resolve the tension. In a "weak," structurally fragmented state, lawsuits and courts provide "nonpolitical," nonstatist mechanisms through which individuals can demand high standards of justice from government. Lawsuits and courts empower interest groups to prod the government to implement ambitious public policies. It is only a slight oversimplification to say that in the United States lawyers, legal rights, judges, and lawsuits are the functional equivalent of the large central bureaucracies that dominate governance in high-tax, activist welfare states.

Adversarial legalism gives the United States the most politically and socially responsive court system in the world. Compared to most national judiciaries, American judges are less constrained by legal formalisms; they are more policy-oriented, more attentive to the equities (and inequities) of the particular situation. In the decentralized American legal system, if one judge closes the door on a novel legal argument, claimants can often find a more receptive judge in another court. Adversarial legalism makes the judiciary and lawyers more fully part of the governing process and more fully democratic in character. But this kind of "responsive law," in the words of Philippe Nonet and Philip Selznick (1978), is a "high risk strategy" of governance. With its high costs and penalties, and with its responsiveness to private claims, adversarial litigation enables ideologues or opportunists to use the law as a tool for extortion. In its eagerness to put aside legal formalism in order to seek good outcomes, responsive law generates high levels of legal unpredictability, at least when it is implemented through adversarial legalism. Thus adversarial legalism is an extremely inefficient and hence often unfair way of meeting the public's demand for justice and protection. The world's most responsive legal system does not necessarily give Americans the world's most reliable legal system or the world's most responsive system of governance.

to reduce the private costs of civil justice. The American system is shaped more by an exceptionally large, entrepreneurial, and politically assertive legal profession, and less by national ministries of justice. A wider range of problems are taken to court in the United States, and as this chapter shows, its civil justice system has swallowed much larger doses of adversarial legalism. The chapter that follows this one explores in more detail adversarial legalism's effects in the realm of tort law, the most controversial form of civil justice in the United States.

The Two Faces of Adversarial Legalism in Action

By placing powerful tools of pretrial discovery in the hands of entrepreneurial lawyers, adversarial legalism provides more probing forms of fact-finding than do other civil justice systems, and it provides more flexible and potent remedies. The politically responsive American judiciary is quicker than its counterparts in other countries to endorse new causes of action and more willing to craft legal techniques with which to call governmental bodies and corporations to account for unjust decisions or heedless practices. On the other hand, adversarial legalism makes American civil litigation especially costly, unpredictable, and alienating.

Adversarial legalism's attractive face is illustrated by Gilmore v. Columbia Falls Aluminum Company. By 1985, according to a lengthy New York Times article by Jim Robbins (1998), Columbia Falls Aluminum Company, located in northwestern Montana, had become a perennial money loser. Its corporate owner, Atlantic Richfield Company (ARCO), sold the company to Brack Duker and Jerome Broussard for $1, plus $3 million for unsold inventory. As part of the deal, the parties agreed that Columbia Falls workers would be entitled to "at least 50 percent" of any future annual profit, an agreement referred to in a letter from ARCO to Duker. After taking over Columbia Falls Aluminum, Duker and Broussard embarked on a major cost-cutting program, persuading hundreds of workers to accept a 15 percent pay cut in return for the promise of a 50 percent share of future profits. Faced with the alternative—shutting down the plant—the workers consented. Beginning in 1986, Columbia Falls Aluminum started making money. The new owners split the $2.6 million in profits with Columbia Falls employees. Robbins goes on:

> But over the next five years, rather than splitting the take, [Duker and Broussard] funneled much of the money into offshore bank accounts. Before they cut off their union and salaried employees altogether, the two men had awarded $84 million to them and $231 million to themselves. . . .
> . . . In 1989, Mr. Duker and Mr. Broussard dismissed their chief financial officer after he raised concerns about their financial practices. . . . [Later] a 39-year-old accountant at the plant named Roberta Gilmore challenged the company's bookkeeping practices and was promptly told, she says, to keep her mouth shut.
>
> Instead, after fuming for a couple of years, she filed a [class action] lawsuit. . . . At one point, the two small-town lawyers she hired showed up in Federal Court in Missoula, Mont., wearing polar fleece jackets and Sorel boots. They were greeted by Mr. Duker—flanked by three bodyguards and 13 lawyers in finely tailored suits.
> Clearly, Mr. Duker had the upper hand in any [legal] war of attrition. And yet, five years and 10 months after the suit was filed [and after pretrial discovery and other investigation by the plaintiff's lawyers unearthed the diversion of funds noted above, plus a letter from ARCO memorializing the profit-sharing requirement] he threw in the towel. Just two weeks before Ms. Gilmore's lawsuit was scheduled for trial, he agreed to pay the [approximately 1,000] workers $97 million. . . . When she heard the news, Ms. Gilmore broke into sobs.

Gilmore's lawyers—who at one point had to take out an $800,000 bank loan to pay their expenses—were to receive $6 million of the $32 million settlement for salaried employees, and labor union lawyers were to receive 10 percent of the $65 million settlement for hourly employees. Duker's lawyer sued him, claiming that Duker had refused to pay a promised bonus of $3 million for holding the final settlement to $100 million or less (Robbins, 1998: 11).

Gilmore v. Columbia Falls Aluminum Company exemplifies the strengths of American adversarial legalism. By validating class actions and thereby offering the prospect of very large fees to plaintiffs' lawyers, the American civil justice system taps the energy of entrepreneurial lawyers, enabling legally inexperienced citizens such as Roberta Gilmore to pursue legal claims against economically powerful "repeat players." By authorizing wide-ranging, lawyer-guided pretrial discovery, adversarial legalism enables plaintiffs' lawyers to uncover even carefully concealed evidence of malfeasance. Gilmore and her lawyers gained courage from the distinctive "American rule" concerning attorneys' fees and court costs, for it holds that even if they had lost, they would not be responsible for Mr. Duker's massive lawyers' bills. In sum, in giving ordinary people extraordinary legal weapons, American adversarial le-galism contrasts with civil justice systems that are cheaper and more expeditious but less creative and less threatening. Doris Marie Provine (1996: 239) writes:

> France has taken considerable pains to keep the fees for civil litigation at a reasonable level. A 1991 law, for example, makes civil litigation free to those who cannot afford it. The system encourages laypersons to represent themselves and a significant minority do, especially before administrative tribunals. Even when people do hire lawyers, self-imposed and court-imposed restrictions on the scope of their activities tend to keep the fees much lower than in the United States. What the system does not provide, however, is a check on the excesses of powerful institutions. The problem, as Cappelletti and Garth observe, is that "a right of individual access, however liberally granted, does not necessarily lead to the vindication of new rights on a very large scale."

Consider, however, the less attractive face of adversarial legalism, exemplified by Johnson v. Johnson. In 1983 Seward Johnson, heir to the Johnson & Johnson health care products fortune, died at the age of eighty-seven. Johnson's will, drafted in the last months of his life, left the bulk of his $400 million estate to his third wife, Basia. In 1968 Basia, a recent immigrant from Poland, had come to the Johnson home as a kitchen employee; three years later she married Johnson, forty years her senior. Johnson's will left nothing to his six children, from whom he had long been estranged (apparently for good reason); years earlier, however, he had given each child a trust containing tens of millions of dollars' worth of Johnson & Johnson stock (Margolick, 1993).

Seward Johnson's children challenged the validity of his will in the New York Surrogate's Court, claiming Basia—who had become increasingly imperious as Seward declined—used undue influence in getting Johnson to change the will in her favor. Their case, according to David Margolick's detailed account, was legally (as well as morally) weak: in a sequence of earlier wills, Johnson had similarly left nothing to his dissolute children on grounds that their trust funds were enough, and he had made successively more generous bequests to Basia (Margolick, 1993: 198, 268). But Johnson's children employed smart, aggressive lawyers from a big New York City firm. They conducted marathon pretrial depositions of Basia, the children, and Seward Johnson's lawyer (Goldsmith, 1987) and concocted enough of an argument, in the judge's view, to get a jury trial. Before and during the over-three-month trial, the presiding judge displayed "astonishing partiality" toward the claimants (Langbein, 1994: 2041). Before the trial ended, Basia agreed to a settlement that gave about $40 million of the estate to the Johnson children and paid their legal fees. The legal fees for both sides amounted, amazingly, to $25 million (Goldsmith, 1987)—enough to pay the annual salaries and benefits of at least 500 new police officers, nurses, or schoolteachers.

Reviewing Margolick's account of the Johnson litigation, John Langbein (1994: 2043) points out that litigation based on claims of undue influence or unsound mind, "which occupy so prominent a place in American probate law, are virtually unknown both on the Continent and in English and Commonwealth legal systems."[1] "Anywhere else in the Western world," Langbein continues (id. at 2045), "the Johnson children's lawsuit would have been suppressed in short order. In the United States, it became a license to exploit the shortcomings of the procedural system. Skilled plaintiffs' lawyers extorted a multimillion-dollar payoff for themselves and their unworthy clients." The Johnson will litigation, with its huge stakes, is far from a typical case. But its costliness, legal unpredictability, and arbitrary outcome, Langbein suggests, are the legacies of two distinctive features of the American system of civil justice that characterize ordinary cases as well: a lawyer-dominated, intensely adversarial, and often manipulative system of evidence-gathering and presentation; and trial by jury and by politically appointed, highly autonomous judges.

Johnson v. Johnson does hint at some positive features of American adversarial legalism as well. In some European civil law systems courts are reluctant to look behind the words of a formal legal document (Hazard and Taruffo, 1993); adversarial legalism, with its potent weapons of pretrial discovery, wielded by self-interested and aggressive private attorneys, gives litigants more opportunity to uncover the human truths that lie behind the documentary mask. It is not difficult to find cases in American law reports in which courts thwarted a fortune hunter who really did subvert an ailing testator's mind, hoping to cheat deserving children of their birthright.[2] American judges, less carefully socialized to the bench and less closely supervised than their counterparts in many other countries, may be less predictable, but they also tend to be more flexible, more oriented to practical problem-solving.

Johnson v. Johnson reminds us, however, that adversarial legalism can be used by the unscrupulous, as well as against them, and that a politically selected judiciary, trial by jury, entrepreneurial lawyering, and aggressive pretrial discovery also have four disturbing implications. Viewed in comparative terms, litigation in the United States is extraordinarily costly to the parties, and it entails more legal unpredictability. Costliness and legal uncertainty often result in injustice, as parties (like Basia Johnson) feel compelled to abandon legally justified positions in order to avoid the costs and risks of adjudication. Another result is inequality: parties who can better withstand the costs and risks of litigation and can obtain better lawyering enjoy a greater advantage in the United States over parties who cannot.

These characteristics disturb even those who are sometimes in a position to benefit from them. In 1994 John Lande surveyed 143 American business executives, corporate "inside counsel," and "outside counsel." Asked to assess how the court system has been working on a five-point scale, half the executives and one-third of outside counsel said "poorly." A majority expressed severe doubts about its capacity to determine the truth correctly (Lande, 1998). It is important, therefore, to look more deeply into the dynamics of costliness, unpredictability, injustice, and inequality in American civil justice.

Adversarial Legalism and the Cost of Civil Litigation

If one were starting from scratch, it would be difficult to imagine, much less design, a mode of adjudication that, as in Johnson v. Johnson, would spend $25 million on lawyers to resolve a single dispute. The absolute size of the legal fees in the Johnson conflict was very unusual, to be sure; the fact that the "legal transaction costs" of both sides exceeded the amount actually paid to the claimant was not. In the average American product liability lawsuit, lawyers' fees for both sides, added together, are larger than the amount received by the plaintiff. Even in routine auto accident lawsuits, payments to lawyers account for more than 40 percent of total liability insurance payouts (Hensler et al., 1987: 27–28). The Wisconsin Civil Litigation Project, examining a systematic sample of 1,649 lawsuits in federal and state courts in the 1970s, found that in cases in which the plaintiffs' recoveries were less than $10,000, the median plaintiff's legal costs amounted to some 35 percent of the recovery when her lawyer took the case on a contingent fee basis and 46 percent when she paid her lawyer on an hourly basis (Trubek et al., 1983: 111). Defendants' legal fees generally are almost as large, which indicates that total transaction costs for both sides amount to well over 50 percent of the total settlement.

One 1988 study indicated that when employers were sued in wrongful discharge cases, their legal defense costs alone averaged over $80,000 (Dertouzos et al., 1988), those costs increasing to $124,000 in a 1994 study (Maltby, 1994: 107). The American Intellectual Property Law Association estimated in 1994 that in patent infringement cases the median litigation cost for each side was $280,000 through pretrial discovery and $518,000 through trial (Gerlin, 1994a: B1). According to a 1993 survey, in defending stockholders' fraud claims against their officers and directors, corporations paid law firms an average of $967,000 per case, this average including the

"less expensive" cases that the responding companies won without paying a settlement (Lambert, 1995: B6). Why does American adversarial legalism generate such enormous legal bills? Some cross-national comparisons will provide a large part of the answer.

Lawyer-Dominated versus Judge-Dominated Litigation

While interviewing Dutch representatives of cross-Atlantic shipping lines and marine insurance companies, I asked if the legal resolution of disputed cargo damage claims differs when the cargo damage is discovered in Rotterdam, and hence is subject to Dutch courts, rather than in New York. "Oh yes," I was invariably told. "You have to pay a great deal more in lawyers' bills if the cargo is in the United States." This was not merely because American lawyers charged higher hourly rates but also because they put in far more time—and hence more billable hours—on each case.

American lawyers do more because American judges do less. In civil cases filed in Rotterdam or in other continental European cities, the judge is primarily responsible for interrogating parties and witnesses, selecting expert witnesses, demanding production of relevant documents, identifying the relevant law, and summarizing the evidence. In American litigation those burdens are shouldered by opposing counsel. In continental Europe legal advocates for the contending parties play only a supporting role, identifying witnesses to be interrogated by the judge and suggesting avenues of inquiry or legal analysis the judge may have omitted (Langbein, 1985). Thus in comparative perspective continental European legal systems are "judge-heavy," while the American system is "lawyer-heavy" (id. at 846). A 1973 study indicated that California had about 18 practicing lawyers for each judge, compared to 8 in Italy, 3 in France, 2.5 in Germany, and 2 in Sweden (Council on California Competitiveness, 1992: 88).[3] The Swedish and West German governments spent more on courts, prosecutors, and legal-aid lawyers than their citizens spent on private legal services, but "public sector expenditures in the United States were about one-fourth to one-fifth of private expenditures" (Johnson and Drew, 1978: 10, 55).

Although there are no systematic comparative data, the European practice of allocating many costs of litigation to judges almost certainly results in a much less costly civil adjudication system not only for disputing parties but for society at large (Brookings Institution, 1989: 6). Richard Hulbert (1997: 747), who has practiced law both in the United States and in Paris, writes that when viewed from an American perspective, the French system of civil justice "is cheap. It is quick. It produces judgments that overall seem to be satisfying." In a widely cited article, John Langbein (1985) argued that compared to civil justice in the United States, Germany's adjudicatory system is both cheaper and quicker, mainly because its fact-gathering process is far more efficient. "Probably no unbiased observer would disagree," says Herbert Bernstein (1988: 594), holder of law degrees from both countries. That conclusion is bolstered by considering some of the striking differences in European and American methods of civil litigation.

Redundancy

In strongly contested cases in the United States, separate lawyers for all parties participate in lengthy pretrial depositions, where parties and witnesses are first questioned by one lawyer, then cross-examined by another. In cases that go to trial, the lawyers, parties, and witnesses repeat virtually the same interrogation in open court. In high-stakes cases, lawyers meet with "their" parties and witnesses both before depositions and before trial for another run-through—a rehearsal of the anticipated interrogation (Reitz, 1990: 989). German civil litigation is remarkably different. Langbein (1985: 826) notes that "there is no distinction between pretrial and trial. . . . Trial is not a single continuous event. Rather, the court gathers and evaluates evidence over a series of hearings, as many as the circumstances require." The lawyers for each side nominate the witnesses they wish the judge to question (Bernstein, 1988: 592–593). Hence in contrast to American litigation, German parties and witnesses testify just once, when interrogated by a judge (Reitz, 1990: 989). Because witnesses are not coached in advance by lawyers and it is the judge's responsibility to assess the evidence, there is far less emphasis than in the United States on adversarial challenge—and hence less necessity to have lawyers for both sides present (and paid for) each time a piece of evidence is examined by or presented to the judge (Damaska, 1997a: 846).

All-at-Once versus Episodic Trials

American pretrial discovery is complex and costly, Langbein observes (1985: 831), partly because the sharp division between pretrial and trial encourages American lawyers to "investigate everything that could possibly come up at trial." Once trial begins, lawyers "can seldom go back and search for further evidence." In contrast, the episodic character of German fact-gathering, unfettered by the need to accommodate the jury, means that "if the case takes an unexpected turn, the disadvantaged litigant can count on developing his response in another hearing at a later time."

Dueling Expert Witnesses

In complex cases in which expert technical assessments are required, contending American litigants each hire and carefully coach their own expert witness; in a more hierarchical system such as Germany's, the court appoints a single "neutral" expert witness, who is not coached in advance by anyone (id. at 835–840).[4] A corporate counsel experienced in intellectual property disputes writes that "although European litigation also involves the use of experts; in the U.S. there are experts, experts, and still more experts" (Pantuliano, 1983; see also Somaya, 2000). Thus, according to patent attorney James Maxeiner (1991: 601, 604), "expert testimony in U.S. patent litigation is much more costly than in Germany." In French courts, practicing attorney Richard Hulbert (1997: 749) tells us, the judge appoints an expert for "controverted issues of fact, particularly facts of a technical nature." Then:

> The appointee will conduct an investigation outside the courtroom, under no formal rules of evidence or relevance, at sessions to which the parties are convoked with full freedom to present their views and those of their experts or other representatives, orally or in writing. The results of the expertise is a report that in principle the judge need not accept, but in the absence of other evidence, it is difficult to see how it could be rejected, provided that the judge is satisfied that the expert [whose investigative and reporting procedures are regulated by law] has done what he was commissioned to do and that no material procedural irregularities have been committed.

Trial by Jury

European courts (including British courts, which have abandoned the jury in most civil cases) avoid the extraordinary inefficiencies of the American civil jury trial, such as lengthy, adversarial jury selection (National Center for State Courts, 1988: 110; Kakalik et al., 1990) and legalistic wrangling over what evidence and arguments must be suppressed because they might mislead amateur decisionmakers. Civil trials in the United States that are conducted by only a judge tend to be at least 50 percent shorter than jury trials.[5] And because American jurors, in contrast to judges in Europe, are not given written summaries of the issues and evidence in advance, the whole story of the dispute must be presented to them orally. Each witness is questioned first by one set of lawyers, then cross-examined by another. Unlike a European judge, American jurors cannot comment during trial or indicate that they are satisfied on a certain point. Hence lawyers, uncertain which issues will be regarded as crucial, must cover all issues and, playing it safe, often call "extra" witnesses to testify (Reitz, 1990: 989; Langbein, 1985: 830). Overall, therefore, the average urban jury trial in the United States—in all likelihood a fairly routine motor vehicle accident or other personal injury case—takes about 13.5 hours, spread over several days, to conduct (National Center for State Courts, 1988). (The median for contract and nontort cases is about 14.5 hours.) In 1984 half of all jury trials in Los Angeles and Oakland, California, lasted more than thirty hours, spread over seven days (Kakalik et al., 1990: 110).[6]

Pretrial Discovery

In more than 95 percent of American civil lawsuits there is no trial (Heise, 2000: 823; Ostrom et al., 1996: 234), partly because trials are so costly. In many cases information gathered in pretrial discovery becomes the basis for a settlement. As the Columbia Falls Aluminum case teaches, adversarial pretrial discovery is a powerful tool for unmasking phony defenses and for undermining spurious claims. Nevertheless, even when it works well, the adversarial American pretrial discovery and negotiation process is costly, inefficient, and slow. Second Circuit Court of Appeals judge Ralph K. Winter (1992: 264), a member of the federal courts' Advisory Committee on Civil Rules, lamented: "In private conversations with lawyers and judges, I find precious few ready to argue that pretrial discovery involves less than considerable to enormous waste. . . . [The Advisory Committee found] a no-stone-left-unturned . . . philosophy of discovery governs much litigation and imposes costs, usually without corresponding benefits. . . . Second, discovery is sometimes used as a club against the other party . . . solely to increase the adversary's expenses."

Delay

Besides adversarial legalism's direct costs, American litigants must endure its extraordinary delays if they insist on a jury trial. According to Albert Alschuler (1990: 6), "the average civil case tried during 1988 in the Circuit Court of Cook County [Chicago] had been filed more than six years before." In Los Angeles the median time between filing and trial of a civil action, only 4.2 months in 1942, grew to 19 months in 1962 and 41.5 months (almost three and a half years) in 1982 (Selvin and Ebener, 1984: 27). More typically, in a 1987 study of thirty-seven urban jurisdictions, the median time from filing to jury trial was slightly more than two years, although in Detroit, it was more than three years, and in Providence, Rhode Island, almost five (Goerdt, 1991: 296; Ostrom et al., 1996: 24).[7] In Germany half of civil court plaintiffs have a decision within six months, three-quarters within nine months, and summary proceedings are even faster (Blankenburg, 1994: 806).

The Decline of Adjudication

As a result of the costs and delays associated with adversarial legalism, only a small percentage of American litigants actually get their day in court or have their cases decided by the application of law to the facts by a judge or jury, except for cases that fall within the tight monetary limits for small claims courts. As noted, the percentage of civil cases resolved by trial (as opposed to settlement, withdrawal, or dismissal) is less than 5 percent. Alschuler (1990: 4) concludes: "The civil trial is on its deathbed, or close to it, because our trial system has become unworkable. The American trial has been bludgeoned by lengthy delays, high attorneys' fees, discovery wars, satellite hearings, judicial settlement conferences, and the world's most extensive collection of cumbersome procedures. Few litigants can afford the cost of either the pretrial journey or the trial itself."

The decline of adjudication, as Sam Gross and Kent Syverud (1996: 62) argue, stems from a political and legal system more intent on elaborating the tools of adversarial legalism than on investing in inexpensive, more expeditious methods of civil dispute resolution:

> The essence of adversarial litigation is procedure. . . . When we want to improve our judicial system we pass a procedural reform, which invariably means elaborating old procedural rules or adding new ones—rules that govern the presentation of evidence and arguments, rules that create opportunities to investigate and prepare evidence and argument. . . . The upshot is a masterpiece of detail, with rules on everything from special appearances to contest the jurisdiction of the court, to the use of exhibits during jury deliberation. But we cannot afford it. As litigants, few of us can pay the costs of a trial; as a society, we are unwilling to pay even a fraction of the cost of the judicial apparatus that we would need to try most civil cases. We have designed a spectacular system for adjudicating disputes, but it is too expensive to use.

What is left is a system of civil dispute resolution by negotiation between lawyers, in which nonlegal factors such as cost and delay and the parties' relative ability to sustain them play a major role. And even that system is too expensive for many.

Adversarial Legalism and Legal Unpredictability

In all legal systems most civil cases are settled before trial, as the litigants, advised by their lawyers, come to recognize what their chances would be in court. The cases that go to adjudication are likely to be those in which the litigants can't agree on the likely outcome. Hence in all countries the cases that reach adjudication involve a relatively large amount of legal uncertainty. Yet it appears that legal unpredictability in the civil justice systems of the United States, as exemplified by the Johnson v. Johnson case, is greater than in many other economically advanced democracies.

Johnson v. Johnson is far from unique in that regard. On January 4, 1984, Getty Oil and Pennzoil Corporation, a Houston-based company, announced Pennzoil's purchase of three-sevenths of Getty's stock for $112.50 per share; the press release described the proposed sale as an "agreement in principle" that was "subject to [the] execution of a definitive merger agreement" (Petzinger, 1987: 198; Mnookin and Wilson, 1989: 301). Pennzoil, however, apparently refused to withdraw its original tender offer of $100 per share until a final agreement was signed, sealed, and delivered (Baron and Baron, 1986: 256), and Getty Oil's bitterly divided board of directors continued to seek out a "white knight" who would not only increase the purchase price but would also support current management in its battle with minority shareholders. After being assured by leading corporate takeover professionals that Getty Oil was "free to deal," Texaco offered to buy all of Getty Oil's outstanding stock for $125 per share. Texaco's offer was formally accepted by the relevant parties on January 7, 1984.

Pennzoil sued Getty Oil in Delaware, but the judge declined to block the sale to Texaco. Pennzoil then filed a new lawsuit against New York-based Texaco in Houston, seeking a staggering $14 billion in compensation. Legal analysts agree, based on an independent analysis of the court file, that (1) no contract existed between Pennzoil and Getty under the law of New York, where the Texaco-Getty deal was negotiated; (2) even if Texaco were liable, under either New York or Texas law, Pennzoil's damages should not have exceeded $422 million (id. at 269, 279). Nevertheless, a Houston jury awarded Pennzoil $7.5 billion in "actual damages" and $3 billion in punitive damages. A Texas appeals court reduced the punitive damages to $1 billion, but even Texaco couldn't write an $8.5 billion check and filed for bankruptcy—which was temporary but resulted in a fire sale of $5.1 billion in assets, deeply strained business relationships, and the near collapse of a company that employs thousands of workers (Brown, 1988: H1, H7).

How could a sophisticated company such as Texaco, with its cadre of experienced attorneys and investment bankers, fail by such a wide margin to discern the legal risks to which it was exposed? The answer is that in the decentralized American legal system, constantly being shaped and reshaped by adversarial argument, the legal terrain is often unstable; the ostensibly solid path mapped by one's lawyer can suddenly turn to quicksand. This is not an endemic feature of all legal regimes. When asked about transatlantic cargo damage disputes that reach adjudication, the shipping line and insurance firm representatives whom I interviewed all asserted that results in the courts in Rotterdam are far more predictable than when the litigation occurs in the United States.

After analyzing the record in the Johnson estate case, Professor Langbein, along with David Margolick, the experienced legal correspondent who chronicled the litigation, felt certain that the Johnson children's case lacked legal merit (Margolick, 1993: 198, 268). But the lawyers representing the Johnson estate apparently were not sure that the court would recognize the legal merits of their defense, and Johnson's widow Basia acceded to the children's legal gamble, buying them off with a $40 million settlement. Langbein traces the source of this legal uncertainty (and the defendant's consequent vulnerability to extortionate demands) to two factors: the relatively nonprofessional, political character of the American judiciary, and the unique American insistence on using untrained citizen-jurors to resolve civil cases.

Professional versus Political Judiciaries

German courts have a specialized chamber that deals with commercial disputes and another that deals with patent disputes, along with specialized labor courts and specialized tribunals that deal with disputes concerning social benefits.[8] In the Netherlands cargo damage disputes are channeled into a chamber of the court system staffed by judges who specialize in maritime cases. The United States has specialized federal courts for bankruptcy and for patent appeals, but most litigation is before "generalist" judges. The U.S. District Court judge who hears a cargo damage dispute or a patent infringement case may not have dealt with such cases recently—and perhaps never.[9] She relies on the litigants' attorneys to point out the relevant statutes, precedents, facts, and arguments. Supported by a pragmatic, results-oriented legal culture, the "generalist" American judge is more likely to rely on her own judgment to reach a result that she thinks is just (Atiyah and Summers, 1987). That may sound appealing, but it also adds to legal uncertainty and unpredictability.

In the Netherlands (and in other hierarchically organized European legal systems) judges are recruited, socialized, and supervised in a manner explicitly designed to maximize adjudicative predictability. After a closely supervised apprenticeship, open only to law graduates who have done very well on a nationwide exam,[10] a young judge's progress to more responsible and prestigious posts depends on merit ratings she receives from senior judges in the chambers through which she rotates, as well as on periodic evaluations by the ministry of justice (Meador, 1983: 22–23).[11] The goal of this bureaucratically organized career-management system is to homogenize the judiciary, to make its decisions legally competent, uniform, and predictable.

The American judiciary is professional too, in its own way. All judges have had legal training. They almost uniformly state that their obligation as judges is to apply the law uniformly to all, regardless of their own beliefs. They are constrained by the possibility of appeal and reversal by higher American judges, or by criticism by lawyers and other judges for failure to apply the law in accordance with the conventions of legal reasoning (Cross and Tiller, 1998). Millions of potential disputes are resolved, therefore, when American lawyers tell their clients, with a high degree of conviction, that they will lose if they go to court. The point is not that American law is wholly unpredictable, but that its level of unpredictability is greater than in economically advanced democracies whose judiciaries are selected in a nonpolitical manner. Unlike their counterparts in England or Western Europe or Japan, American judges come to the bench after prior careers as practicing lawyers, prosecutors, or political activists.[12] Some have had little courtroom experience. In most American states, new judges get little formal training, and there is no systematic merit-oriented promotion system (Meador, 1983: 26). Compared to their European counterparts, American judges enjoy far more autonomy vis-à-vis their judicial superiors, both with respect to their career prospects and to their day-to-day legal decisionmaking, and most of the countless procedural decisions that American judges make in the course of pretrial hearings and trials are de facto unreviewable.

There is a method to this ostensible madness. Free from the homogenizing professionalism of hierarchically organized European legal bureaucracies, the American judiciary, precisely because it is politically responsive and less formalistic, is more pragmatic, quicker to invent new rights and remedies, and more willing to adapt the law to changing circumstances and new justice claims. But there is a madness to the method as well; its symptom is susceptibility to comparatively higher levels of legal inconsistency and unpredictability.

Comparing trial judges in England with their politically selected counterparts in the United States, Atiyah and Summers (1987: 164) observe: "It cannot be doubted that in England the judge brings on average a higher level of competence to the entire trial process. The judge is invariably a former barrister of many years' experience and high standing at the bar. . . . In America . . . the situation is much more variable" (see also Hazard and Taruffo, 1993: 68). As shown by an observational study of small claims courts, some American judges are narrowly legalistic, while others tend to act as mediators, and still others tend to decide cases according to their own notions of fairness and desert (Conley and O'Barr, 1987). Decisions by U.S. District Court judges appointed by Democratic presidents are demonstrably more liberal than those appointed by Republican presidents (Rowland and Carp, 1983), and similar findings recur for studies of other courts, both state and federal (Pinello, 1999; Cross and Tiller, 1998). Not surprisingly, American lawyers, as documented by Sarat and Felstiner's (1986) study of divorce lawyers, often tell their clients that the legal outcome will depend on which judge ends up hearing the case. Dutch divorce lawyers, a similar study showed, simply tell their clients what the law prescribes and hence what they can expect in court (Griffiths, 1986).

What's more, stories of seriously biased and incompetent American judges are far from rare (Brill, 1989). The Texas trial judge who instructed the jury in the Pennzoil-Texaco case acknowledged afterward that "there is a good chance that perhaps I read the cases wrong and not have applied [the law] correctly." In fact, he had adopted Pennzoil's proposed jury instructions nearly verbatim while ignoring Texaco's submissions (Petzinger, 1987: 463, 453). Similarly, day by day, the Johnson estate's lawyers saw what seemed to be an airtight case crumble, as the trial judge, a politically active former personal injury lawyer, repeatedly acted in a biased and improper manner (Margolick, 1993: 301–313). "Americans can only look with envy," Langbein (1985: 2044) asserts, "to the esteemed and meritocratic chancery bench that conducts probate adjudication in English and Commonwealth jurisdictions." The American judiciary, far from homogenized, is not even reliably pasteurized, and it is not always the cream that rises to the top. The result is a higher level of legal unpredictability.

Juries

"American law is unique," says Langbein (1985: 2043), "in undertaking to resolve will contests by means of civil jury trial" in which skillful lawyers strive "to evoke the jurors' sympathy for disinherited offspring and to excite their likely hostility towards a devisee such as Basia, who can so easily be painted as a homewrecking adventurer." Ironically, some scholars suggest, Americans have emphasized trial by jury because they fear the biases and inconsistencies of a politically appointed, nonprofessional judiciary (Schuck, 1993: 310). But the cure may be worse than the disease.

As George Priest (1993: 130) puts it, "The civil jury is an engine of inconsistency." In the jury system judgment is entrusted to an ever-changing cluster of individuals who are not told about the applicable rules of law until the trial is over, nor instructed how similar cases have been decided by other juries. Jurors are not expected to explain and justify their decisions, and thus one jury's decisions cannot be systematically compared with another's. That is not to say that juries usually or even frequently ignore the judge's instructions, or that they often reach decisions on the basis of emotion rather than evidence. On average, researchers have found, jurors regard plaintiffs' claims for money damages with some skepticism. Marc Galanter (1993: 70) concludes: "The literature, on the whole, converges on the judgment that juries are fine decisionmakers. They are conscientious, collectively they understand and recall the evidence as well as judges, and they decide on the basis of the evidence presented."[13] When researchers presented similar tort cases to over 500 mock juries, they found that individual jurors drawn from different states, ethnic groups, income levels, and age groups tended to make remarkably similar average judgments about the defendant's moral culpability and the severity of the harm (Schkade et al., 2000: 1156). Jury decisions thus are not random (Osborne, 1999). But that does not mean that the jury system yields legal predictability.

In the University of Chicago Jury Project in the 1950s, researchers asked judges who had presided over jury trials how they would have decided the case had it been a bench trial. The judge agreed with the jury's decision on liability in 79 percent of the cases (Kalven, 1964; Kalven and Zeisel, 1966: 56; Galanter, 1993).[14] That is only moderately encouraging. Legal uncertainty stems from two looming problems: first, one cannot tell in advance whether any particular jury will be the one in five or so that decides idiosyncratically, and second, the idiosyncratic judgment is likely to go uncorrected. A Philadelphia judge, referring to two asbestos cases he had presided over, commented: "[T]wo men had similar physical problems. They each had pleural thickening and some shortness of breath. In the case involving the man who counsel believed to be the sicker of the two, the jury awarded $15,000. For the other plaintiff, the jury awarded $1,200,000. These results make this litigation more like roulette than jurisprudence" (Hensler, 1985: 65).[15] To a legal scholar from another country, the striking point would be not only that the juries decided inconsistently, but that there was no mechanism for reconciling their judgments.[16]

Peter Huber (1990: 290) compared verdicts by different juries in a sequence of cases concerning claims of harm from Bendectin (a morning sickness drug), in another sequence of cases involving an alleged defect in Audi motor cars, and in sequences of cases involving several other allegedly dangerous products. Most juries, in accordance with the weight of the scientific evidence presented, found that the product in question was not defective or not responsible for the plaintiffs' injuries. But, as Huber noted, "Every new case has a new jury, and one jury's finding is not binding on the next's." In each sequence of trials concerning a particular product, one or a few juries, hearing the same evidence as those that found no liability, decided otherwise and awarded the plaintiff massive compensatory and punitive damages. The modal jury award was nothing at all, but the mean award was in the millions of dollars. For each manufacturer in question, the result was inescapable legal uncertainty and enormous litigation expenses (id. at 278; Sugarman, 1985b: 599–602; Bork, 1996: A15).

In the above-mentioned study of more than 500 mock juries, the researchers found that in deliberating over the appropriate monetary damage award, juries were unpredictable, producing a wide range of results; moreover, jury deliberations often yielded awards far larger than the evaluations that most individual jurors had made before deliberation began, and sometimes larger than any juror had made before deliberating (Schkade et al., 2000: 1139). Judges ultimately reduce jury awards as legally unjustified in 20 to 25 percent of cases, more often for large verdicts (Peterson, 1983: ix–x; Broder, 1986); Ostrom et al., 1993; Adler, 1994: 244; Vidmar et al., 1998). But this does not produce legal predictability. The judges do not always reduce damage awards. Their decisions in that regard are not subject to definitive legal rules and are rarely reversible on appeal. Compounding the legal uncertainty, judges almost never reverse a jury decision for awarding insufficient damages or no damages at all.

Examining the inconsistent outcomes in the Bendectin trials, Joseph Sanders (1993) locates the problem not in the jury per se but in the organization of a jury-focused trial system dominated by the parties' lawyers. Information on causation was provided by conflicting, lawyer-coached expert witnesses, presenting different kinds of scientific evidence, not back-to-back but at widely separated points in the trial. The lawyers' cross-examination of the witnesses was designed more to generate contradictions and to obfuscate than to inform. No wonder, Sanders concludes, the result was a body of testimony that failed to enable the lay fact-finders to weigh properly the quality of experts or the scientific findings on Bendectin's effects.

Guessing what a jury will do is made even more difficult by the infrequency of jury decisions. Since only a tiny percentage of civil cases go to verdict, the jury system sends only weak and static-filled signals to the trial bar.[17] News media coverage of trial verdicts is selective, oversampling very large jury verdicts or cases in which juries find liability in unlikely situations (MacCoun, 1993; Aks et al., 2000). The result, as indicated by a number of studies summarized by Galanter (1993: 81–86), is that lawyers come up with widely divergent pretrial estimates of a case's likely outcome at trial. When Douglas Rosenthal (1974) asked five experienced New York trial lawyers to read the files and estimate the recovery value of fifty-nine settled cases, their predictions were way off. The median recovery was about 75 percent of the experts' estimates, and 40 percent of recoveries were less than two-thirds of the experts' estimates. And in a study of 443 back and neck injury cases, Philip Hermann (1962) found that only one-sixth of the final demands and offers by plaintiffs and defendants came within 25 percent of the jury's actual verdict.

One might argue that these and similar studies (Danzon, 1985: 50; Kritzer, 1990: 31; Clermont and Eisenberg, 1992: 1170–1172; Priest, 1993: 129) reflect the incompetence of the average lawyer rather than any defect in the jury system. But a legal system in which the average lawyer is very poor at predicting outcomes, for whatever reason, is an unpredictable legal system. One might argue too that these studies focus on personal injury cases, in which both the substantive law and the law of damages are unusually vague, even by American standards, and in which clever appeals to jury sympathy might (but might not) sway the verdict. But legal uncertainty, as indicated by Pennzoil v. Texaco and Johnson v. Johnson, reigns in other spheres of civil litigation as well. An analysis of a broad sample of cases found substantial variation between attorneys' expectations and actual awards after trial by judges and juries (Osborne, 1999: 193).[18] Kent Syverud (1997: 1943) points to "the almost universal election of businesses and governments to opt out of fact finding by a civil jury when they are civil plaintiffs," because they perceive "that there is less predictability . . . in fact finding by a civil jury than in dispute resolution by other methods."

Legal unpredictability also pervades American family law (Ellman, 1999), in which judges, not juries, decide alimony, child custody, and marital property distribution disputes. The authors of a study of divorce and custody litigation in Wisconsin note: "Several of the lawyers we interviewed report that they have difficulty in discerning court standards and that they cannot predict the outcomes of court processes. . . . Even the lawyers . . . who do think there are set standards and who do say they can predict outcomes differ in their opinion of the content of those court standards" (Erlanger et al., 1987: 599). In a survey of attorneys (Lande, 1998: 32), one typical respondent said:

> I started out as a plaintiffs' trial attorney with a strong belief in the jury system. . . . I don't believe that anymore. I think . . . it behooves you to do anything possible to avoid it. . . . You can go through all of the different systems, whether it be family law through divorce, products claims, malpractice claims, securities litigation, you know, virtually every category of major litigation. . . . Is it predictable, reliable in terms of a rule? Are the transaction costs reasonable in terms of a result? Does it provide guidance for the future? Not a single one of these systems would even get a passing grade.

Because of the costs and delays of trials, many busy court systems have encouraged "managerial judging," whereby judges pressure the parties' lawyers to settle cases before trial. But this too adds to legal uncertainty, for judges differ in the intensity with which they apply pressures to settle and in their knowledge of the facts (Frankel, 1975: 1042; Resnick, 1982; Yeazell, 1994; Molot, 1998: 992). In European civil justice systems, where judges dominate the fact-gathering processes, settlement negotiations occur under the nose of a third party who is deeply familiar with the case. In both kinds of legal systems, pretrial settlements occur "in the shadow of the law." But the greater predictability of European adjudication means that the boundary of the shadow is far clearer.

Injustice

By making litigation and adjudication slow, very costly, and unpredictable, adversarial legalism often transforms the civil justice system into an engine of injustice, compelling litigants to abandon just claims and defenses. Dixie Flag Manufacturing Company, a firm in San Antonio, Texas, with sixty-three employees, makes and sells American flags. In 1991 Dixie Flag was sued by a person who had seen some men lowering a large flag in a parking lot, and then volunteered to help so that the flag would not touch the ground. As the volunteer grasped the flag, according to his subsequent legal complaint, a gust of wind billowed the massive banner high into the air. The plaintiff, apparently more patriotic than he was quick-witted, failed to let go, and the flag pulled him high off the ground. Then he let go. He crashed to the ground and was injured. His patriotism now tempered by avarice, he sued Dixie Flag for compensatory damages. The company's president spent considerable time combing old company records but could find no evidence that his company had even made that particular flag. Nevertheless, Dixie Flag's liability insurance carrier paid the plaintiff $6,000 to settle the suit, much to its client's outrage. The insurers explained that it would have cost $10,000 in attorneys' fees to prevail in court (Van de Putte, 1995: A14).[19]

The Dixie Flag settlement is far from unique. In a 1992 survey of 234 municipal government attorneys, "over 80% acknowledge that on occasion they settle cases that would be winnable . . . just to save money in the short term" (McManus, 1993: 835). Conversely, the costs and unpredictability of adversarial legalism induce potential plaintiffs to back away from asking the courts to vindicate entirely just legal claims when they are met with questionable but costly-to-rebut legal defenses. California collection agencies, the president of their trade association estimated, take no more than 20 percent of their debt default cases to court, largely because of litigation expenses, complexities, and delays (Kagan, 1984: 338). Charles Ruhlin found that a major multinational bank with credit card operations in the United States and Germany is more reluctant to sue delinquent debtors in the United States because German courts deal with collection cases far more efficiently and reliably (Ruhlin, 2000). The bank ends up writing off a significantly larger proportion of unpaid debt here than it does in Germany.

Manipulative Lawyering

As the Dixie Flag and the Johnson estate cases suggest, adversarial legalism's expense and unpredictability also encourage and reward manipulative lawyering and extortive demands. An experienced corporate counsel, comparing patent litigation in the United States and in Europe, observed that one is much more likely to encounter hyperaggressive lawyering and obstructionist defenses in the United States (Pantuliano, 1983). Dutch and American shipping company and insurance officials told me that if settlement negotiations in cargo damage claims take place in the shadow of Dutch courts, they are "more logical" than negotiations that occur in New York, where the lawyers are more likely "to see what they can get away with" or to take an uncompromising stand based on a legalistic reading of the bill of lading. The American lawyer's goal, in the claims agents' view, was not to work out a reasonable agreement based on the facts and the law but to manipulate the law and its cumbersome processes so as to extort concessions from the other side.

In terms of personal character, Rotterdam lawyers may be no less Machiavellian, on average, than are New York lawyers. But compared with the United States, professional codes of ethics in the Netherlands, as in England and other countries in Western Europe, more strongly enjoin lawyers to temper one-sided advocacy in the search for objective legal truth (Osiel, 1990: 2019; Atiyah and Summers, 1987: 163). Moreover, in the decentralized, adversarial American court system—with its long delays before adjudication, its weak hierarchical controls over lawyer-controlled pretrial discovery, its legal uncertainty, and its opportunities for forum shopping—lawyers have much stronger incentives to "see what they can get away with" than they do in Holland. Because litigation in Holland is less costly and more legally predictable, Dutch litigants have less reason to succumb to a settlement that departs from the law solely in order to avoid the costs of further pretrial discovery and the risks of going to trial.

To be sure, manipulative American lawyers run some risk that their adversaries will haul them before a judge, where they can be sanctioned for pretrial discovery abuse or for making factually unfounded legal claims. Within some tight-knit communities of lawyers, reputational networks discourage excessively adversarial litigation activity (Gilson and Mnookin, 1994). In cases in which the monetary stakes are small, neither side, typically, invests much in legal maneuvering (Trubek et al., 1983). Many, perhaps most, American lawyers prefer an ideal of gentlemanly interaction to that of the warrior litigator (Kagan and Rosen, 1985). Nevertheless, studies suggest that superaggressive, manipulative lawyering—explicitly designed to increase the other side's litigation bills and thereby to induce them to compromise their claims or defenses—is sufficiently common that any potential litigant would rationally be afraid of encountering it (Garth, 1993: 939–945, 949). Chicago lawyers who frequently are involved in large-stakes litigation admitted to a researcher that they had used discovery tools in 40 percent or more of their cases simply to impose work burdens or economic pressure on their adversaries. More than 80 percent said they had sometimes done so, employing discovery tactics in order to slow down the progress of the suit, shipping huge numbers of documents to opponents in hopes of obscuring crucial information, or tutoring witnesses to give evasive answers in depositions (Brazil, 1980a: 857).

It is all quite logical. The more a disputing party has to spend in defending or asserting a just position, the greater her incentive to compromise her legal claims or defenses and make concessions to settle the case, simply to avoid further legal costs. In a regime of adversarial legalism, disputing parties' litigation costs are higher than in more hierarchically organized, less adversarial legal systems; hence the incentives to compromise just claims and defenses are greater. In the United States, moreover, because even a party who wins at trial generally must pay her own legal fees, lawyers and disputing parties have greater incentives to inflict litigation costs or delays on their adversaries in order to induce them to make greater concessions. In the absence of a "loser pays" rule, lawyers also have incentives to make and cling to legally weak claims and defenses, for even weak legal arguments force one's adversary to expend resources to rebut them, and hence may have some "settlement value" (Molot, 1998: 992).[20] In consequence, in the United States, parties' relative capacity to bear the costs of litigation plays a much larger role in case disposition than in judge-dominated adjudicatory systems.

Large Stakes and Extortive Settlements

The extortive settlement in Johnson v. Johnson did not stem from one party's eagerness to avoid pretrial discovery burdens or other litigation costs. Rather, it stemmed from the explosive combination of very large financial

Uncertain Deterrence

With its energetic plaintiffs' lawyers—fueled by contingency fees, far-reaching powers of pretrial discovery, and the prospect of large money damages—American tort law is uniquely capable of exposing and penalizing those responsible for unsafe products and negligent practices (Speiser, 1980). It stands to reason, defenders of the system argue, that "reforms" that diminish tort law's fierceness or replace it with a more efficient, nonfault-based compensation system would weaken tort law's regulatory and condemnatory function and therefore make life in the United States more dangerous. Accurately assessing the regulatory effects of American tort law, however, is not easy. As Stephen Sugarman (1989) has pointed out, besides the threat of tort liability, individuals and organizations are simultaneously subject to other, often more salient, inducements for safe and responsible behavior. Pilots and motor vehicle drivers are motivated by the instincts of self-preservation. The precautions taken by physicians and product engineers are motivated primarily by professional ethics. For airlines and product manufacturers, market forces provide strong inducements to construct multiple layers of precautions because serious fatal accidents, dramatized on television news programs, can destroy a company's reputation and market share. Finally, direct governmental regulation, with its roadway speed limits, factory inspections, and permit systems (plus the threat of criminal penalties for willful violations that result in accidents), provides more immediate and more specific instructions than tort law on how to prevent harm.

Moreover, Sugarman argues, the liability system's deterrent threat is muted by liability insurance and by the uncertainty and delayed effects of tort liability. Then there is the stubborn persistence of human incompetence, inattentiveness, and calculated corner-cutting, which lead truck drivers, emergency room doctors, and the crew of the Exxon Valdez to make mistakes, no matter how large the potential tort liability. After surveying American corporate product design staffs, George Eads and Peter Reuter (1984: 263–294) wrote, "Although product liability exerts a powerful influence on product design decisions, it sends an extremely vague signal. Because the linkage between good design and a firm's liability exposure remains tenuous, the signal says only, 'Be careful, or you will be sued.' Unfortunately, it does not say how to be careful, or, more important, how careful to be."[27]

Consequently, efforts to sort out how much tort law really adds to the regulatory equation generally have been rather inconclusive (Schwartz, 1994:

379; Deweese and Trebilcock, 1992: 59–60; ALI, 1991: 32). For example, a comprehensive study concluded that American tort law had stimulated "broad-based improvements in the institutional environment and procedures through which medical care is delivered" (Weiler, 1991: 91). Physicians report having adopted new standard procedures following well-publicized court cases (Weiler, 1991: 127; Givelber et al., 1984; Wiley, 1981). Indeed, some studies indicate that American malpractice law sometimes may "overdeter," leading not only to sensible extra precautions but also to unnecessary hospitalizations, lab tests, and other defensive procedures.[28] On the other hand, Dewees and Trebilcock (1992: 83) observe that while the level of medical malpractice claims in Canada is 20 percent that of the United States, "there appears to be no evidence that Canadian physicians are more careless than their U.S. counterparts." Yet no detailed study analogous to those conducted in the United States has examined the incidence of medical malpractice in Canada or Western Europe. For the same reason, disagreement arises about whether the substitution of social insurance for medical malpractice law in New Zealand adversely affected the quality of care.[29]

Overall, it is by no means clear that life is more dangerous in economically developed countries where tort suits are far less common and less fearsome than in the United States. Nor do other democratic countries, comparing their accident and injury rates with those in the United States, seem inclined to emulate American adversarial legalism. Yet it is hard to believe that the deterrence argument is wholly wrong. Some safety-enhancing measures in the United States—such as warning beepers on trucks and construction machines that are put in reverse gear, improved helmets for football players, softer surfaces under climbing structures in children's playgrounds—probably were stimulated by tort cases that imposed liability on companies or municipalities that had failed to institute those improvements. Recall the midwestern city managers quoted in Chapter 2, who recounted improvements in municipal safety inspections, personnel training, and supervision that had been stimulated by lawsuits (Epp, 1998). In a 1987 study by an international consulting firm, more than half of 101 top corporate executives surveyed said that their companies had added safety features to their products as a result of the threat of lawsuits (Zehnder, 1987; Schwartz, 1994: 480).

Yet systematic studies of particular industries have found little evidence that American tort law consistently or significantly affects product design or safety. In the 1970s and 1980s crashes of small airplanes almost routinely led to lawsuits against the aircraft manufacturers, alleging that the crash stemmed from product defects. Two analyses of safety improvements in small aircraft, however, concluded that litigation and escalating liability insurance costs did not lead to improved aircraft design or lower accident rates (Martin, 1991; Craig, 1991).[30] Meanwhile, sales plummeted, and by the late 1980s domestic production of light aircraft had virtually ceased. Thousands of workers were laid off. Flying probably became riskier, not safer, since users kept flying (rather than retiring) older used planes. Finally, in 1994 Congress enacted the General Aviation Revitalization Act, which limited lawsuits involving planes more than eighteen years old.[31]

Multinational motor vehicle manufacturers claim that no other country comes close to the United States in terms of the incidence and cost of product liability litigation (Kagan, 2000). A major Japanese auto manufacturer asserted that with twice as many of its cars on the road in Japan than in the United States, "[i]ts American operations lead to about 250 product liability claims against the company each year. By contrast, in Japan the number of annual product liability filings averages about two" (Schwartz, 1991: 51). But two careful analyses of the development of particular safety improvements in motor vehicles (ergonomics, braking, lights, crashworthiness) contend that American product liability law—as compared to direct government safety regulation—has made only negligible or, at best, secondary contributions to better design (Graham, 1991; Mackay, 1991). By the time a company's engineers hear that an American jury has found "defects" in their design for a model currently on the road, they usually have completed work on new designs and safety features for subsequent model years.[32]

On the other hand, as in the small aircraft example, American tort law sometimes "overdeters," inducing precautions that make products and services unnecessarily expensive or suppressing the provision of products and services that would actually reduce the risk of harm. In the mid-1980s lawsuits led some manufacturers of the DPT vaccine to exit the business, threatening the supply of a product that has all but wiped out childhood diphtheria, whooping cough, and tetanus, diseases that killed thousands of children in previous generations (Burke, 2001).[33] According to a 1992 survey of 500 public accountancy partnerships in the United States, more than half had limited their audit services, or had shunned certain clients engaged in higher risk markets, in order to protect themselves from lawsuits by disappointed investors (Berton and Lublin, 1992; Berton, 1995).[34] At a congressional hearing a lawyer for Wyeth, a manufacturer of birth control pills, testified that the threat of liability lawsuits was the primary reason that it and other companies had been unwilling to market a "morning after" birth control pill in the United States (although these companies have done so for years in Europe) (Lewin, 1996: A1, A10).[35] A 1995 survey by the Society for Resource Management found that 63 percent of personnel managers declined to make negative evaluative comments when asked for an assessment of a former employee, for fear of landing in court (Louis, 1987: C1).[36]

Overall, therefore, the spotty existing evidence suggests that American tort law has an erratic effect on safety. Potential target groups vary in their attentiveness. Some manufacturers, physicians, corporate personnel officers, and others overestimate the actual risk of being sued, perhaps because of the publicity accorded unrepresentative jury verdicts (Bailis and MacCoun, 1996: 419–429; Edelman et al., 1992: 47–83; Songer, 1988: 585–605), but others do not. Hence tort law sometimes deters. Sometimes it overdeters, compelling adoption of precautions that reduce overall social welfare. Often tort law is too uncertain and unpredictable to affect behavior very much at all, or is far less salient than other inducements to responsible behavior. All in all, therefore, critics of the system have argued that American tort law's regulatory effects are too mixed, uncertain, and scattered to justify an adversarial system that generates large economic costs, pours a great deal of money into lawyers' bills, and fails to provide just and reliable compensation.

HOUSE OF LORDS

OPINIONS OF THE LORDS OF APPEAL FOR JUDGMENT

IN THE CAUSE

Tomlinson (FC) (Original Respondent and Cross-appellant) v. Congleton Borough Council and others (Original Appellants and Cross-respondents)

[2003] UKHL 47

LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD

My Lords,

1. I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech of my noble and learned friend Lord Hoffmann. For the reasons he gives, with which I agree, I would allow this appeal.

LORD HOFFMANN

My Lords,

The accident

2. In rural south-east Cheshire the early May Bank Holiday week-end in 1995 was unseasonably hot. John Tomlinson, aged 18, had to work until midday on Saturday 6 May but then met some of his friends and drove them to Brereton Heath Country Park, between Holmes Chapel and Congleton. The Park covers about 80 acres. In about 1980 Congleton Borough Council acquired the land, surrounding what was then a derelict sand quarry, and laid it out as a country park. Paths now run through woods of silver birch and in summer bright yellow brimstone butterflies flutter in grassy meadows. But the attraction of the Park for John Tomlinson and his young friends was a 14 acre lake which had been created by flooding the old sand quarry. The sandy banks provided some attractive beaches and in hot weather many people, including families with children, went there to play in the sand, sunbathe and paddle in the water. A beach at the far end of the lake from the car park was where in fine weather groups of teenagers like John Tomlinson would regularly hang out. He had been going there since he was a child.

3. After sitting in the hot sun for a couple of hours, John Tomlinson decided that he wanted to cool off. So he ran out into the water and dived. He had done the same thing many times before. But this time the dive was badly executed because he struck his head hard on the sandy bottom. So hard that he broke his neck at the fifth vertebra. He is now a tetraplegic and unable to walk.

4. It is a terrible tragedy to suffer such dreadful injury in consequence of a relatively minor act of carelessness. It came nowhere near the stupidity of Luke Ratcliff, a student who climbed a fence at 2.30 am on a December morning to take a running dive into the shallow end of a swimming pool (see Ratcliff v McConnell [1999] 1 WLR 670) or John Donoghue, who dived into Folkestone Harbour from a slipway at midnight on 27 December after an evening in the pub (Donoghue v Folkestone Properties Ltd [2003] 2 WLR 1138). John Tomlinson's mind must often recur to that hot day which irretrievably changed his life. He may feel, not unreasonably, that fate has dealt with him unfairly. And so in these proceedings he seeks financial compensation: for the loss of his earning capacity, for the expense of the care he will need, for the loss of the ability to lead an ordinary life. But the law does not provide such compensation simply on the basis that the injury was disproportionately severe in relation to one's own fault or even not one's own fault at all. Perhaps it should, but society might not be able to afford to compensate everyone on that principle, certainly at the level at which such compensation is now paid. The law provides compensation only when the injury was someone else's fault. In order to succeed in his claim, that is what Mr Tomlinson has to prove.

Occupiers' liability

5. In these proceedings Mr Tomlinson sues the Congleton Borough Council and the Cheshire County Council, claiming that as occupiers of the Park they were in breach of their duties under the Occupiers' Liability Acts 1957 and 1984. If one had to decide which of the two councils was the occupier, it might not be easy. Although the Park belongs to the Borough Council, it is managed on their behalf by the Countryside Management Service of the County Council. The Borough Council provides the funds to enable the Countryside Management Service to maintain the Park. It is the County which employs the Rangers who look after it. But the two Councils very sensibly agreed that one or other or both was the occupier. Unless it is necessary to distinguish between the County Council and the Borough Council for the purpose of telling the story, I shall call them both the Council.

Visitor or trespasser?

6. The 1957 Act was passed to amend and codify the common law duties of occupiers to certain persons who came upon their land. The common law had distinguished between invitees, in whose visit the occupier had some material interest, and licensees, who came simply by express or implied permission. Different duties were owed to each class. The Act, on the recommendation of the Law Reform Committee (Third Report: Occupiers' Liability to Invitees, Licensees and Trespassers, Cmd. 9305 (1954)), amalgamated (without redefining) the two common law categories, designated the combined class "visitors" (section 1(2)) and provided that (subject to contrary agreement) all visitors should be owed a "common duty of care". That duty is set out in section 2(2), as refined by subsections 2(3) to (5):

> "2 (2) The common duty of care is a duty to take such care as in all the circumstances of the case is reasonable to see that the visitor will be reasonably safe in using the premises for the purposes for which he is invited or permitted by the occupier to be there.
> (3) The circumstances relevant for the present purpose include the degree of care, and of want of care, which would ordinarily be looked for in such a visitor, so that (for example) in proper cases—
> (a) an occupier must be prepared for children to be less careful than adults; and
> (b) an occupier may expect that a person, in the exercise of his calling, will appreciate and guard against any special risks ordinarily incident to it, so far as the occupier leaves him free to do so.
> (4) In determining whether the occupier of premises has discharged the common duty of care to a visitor, regard is to be had to all the circumstances, so that (for example)—
> (a) where damage is caused to a visitor by a danger of which he had been warned by the occupier, the warning is not to be treated without more as absolving the occupier from liability, unless in all the circumstances it was enough to enable the visitor to be reasonably safe; and

(b) where damage is caused to a visitor by a danger due to the faulty execution of any work of construction, maintenance or repair by an independent contractor employed by the occupier, the occupier is not to be treated without more as answerable for the danger if in all the circumstances he had acted reasonably in entrusting the work to an independent contractor and had taken such steps (if any) as he reasonably ought in order to satisfy himself that the contractor was competent and that the work had been properly done.

(5) The common duty of care does not impose on an occupier any obligation to a visitor in respect of risks willingly accepted as his by the visitor (the question whether a risk was so accepted to be decided on the same principles as in other cases in which one person owes a duty of care to another)."

7. At first Mr Tomlinson claimed that the Council was in breach of its common duty of care under section 2(2). His complaint was that the premises were not reasonably safe because diving into the water was dangerous and the Council had not given adequate warning of this fact or taken sufficient steps to prevent or discourage him from doing it. But then a difficulty emerged. The County Council, as manager of the Park, had for many years pursued a policy of prohibiting swimming or the use of inflatable dinghies or mattresses. Canoeing and windsurfing were allowed in one area of the lake and angling in another. But not swimming; except, I suppose, by capsized canoeists or windsurfers. Notices had been erected at the entrance and elsewhere saying "Dangerous Water. No Swimming". The policy had not been altogether effective because many people, particularly rowdy teenagers, ignored the notices. They were sometimes rude to the Rangers who tried to get them out of the water. Nevertheless, it was hard to say that swimming or diving was, in the language of section 2(2), one of the purposes "for which [Mr Tomlinson was] invited or permitted by the occupier to be there". The Council went further and said that once he entered the lake to swim, he was no longer a "visitor" at all. He became a trespasser, to whom no duty under the 1957 Act is owed. The Council cited a famous bon mot of Scrutton LJ in The Calgarth [1927] P. 93, 110: "When you invite a person into your house to use the staircase, you do not invite him to slide down the banisters". This quip was used by Lord Atkin in Hillen v ICI (Alkali) Ltd [1936] AC 65, 69 to explain why stevedores who were lawfully on a barge for the purpose of discharging it nevertheless became trespassers when they went onto an inadequately supported hatch cover in order to unload some of the cargo. They knew, said Lord Atkin (at pp. 69-70) that they ought not to use the covered hatch for this purpose; "for them for such a purpose it was out of bounds; they were trespassers". So the stevedores could not complain that the barge owners should have warned them that the hatch cover was not adequately supported. Similarly, says the Council, Mr Tomlinson became a trespasser and took himself outside the 1957 Act when he entered the water to swim.

8. Mr Tomlinson's advisers, having reflected on the matter, decided to concede that he was indeed a trespasser when he went into the water. Although that took him outside the 1957 Act, it did not necessarily mean that the Council owed him no duty. At common law the only duty to trespassers was not to cause them deliberate or reckless injury, but after an inconclusive attempt by the House of Lords to modify this rule in British Railways Board v Herrington [1972] AC 877, the Law Commission recommended the creation of a statutory duty to trespassers: see its Report on Liability for Damage or Injury to Trespassers and Related Questions of Occupiers' Liability (1976) Cmnd. 6428. The recommendation was given effect by the Occupiers' Liability Act 1984. Section 1(1) describes the purpose of the Act:

"1. (1) The rules enacted by this section shall have effect, in place of the rules of the common law, to determine—
(a) whether any duty is owed by a person as occupier of premises to persons other than his visitors in respect of any risk of their suffering injury on the premises by reason of any danger due to the state of the premises or to things done or omitted to be done on them; and
(b) if so, what that duty is."

9. The circumstances in which a duty may arise are then defined in sub-section (3) and the content of the duty is described in subsections (4) to (6):

"(3) An occupier of premises owes a duty to another (not being his visitor) in respect of any such risk as is referred to in subsection (1) above if—
(b) he knows or has reasonable grounds to believe that the other is in the vicinity of the danger concerned or that he may come into the vicinity of the danger (in either case, whether he has lawful authority for being in that vicinity or not); and
(c) the risk is one against which, in all the circumstances of the case, he may reasonably be expected to offer the other some protection.
(4) Where, by virtue of this section, an occupier of premises owes a duty to another in respect of such a risk, the duty is to take such care as is reasonable in all the circumstances of the case to see that he does not suffer injury on the premises by reason of the danger concerned.
(5) Any duty owed by virtue of this section in respect of a risk may, in an appropriate case, be discharged by taking such steps as are reasonable in all the circumstances of the case to give warning of the danger concerned or to discourage persons from incurring the risk.
(6) No duty is owed by virtue of this section to any person in respect of risks willingly accepted as his by that person (the question whether a risk was so accepted to be decided on the same principles as in other cases in which one person owes a duty of care to another)."

10. Mr Tomlinson says that the conditions set out in sub-section (3) were satisfied. The Council was therefore under a duty under subsection (4) to take reasonable care to see that he did not suffer injury by reason of the danger from diving. Subsection (5) shows that although in appropriate circumstances it may be sufficient to warn or discourage, the notices in the present case had been patently ineffectual and therefore it was necessary to take more drastic measures to prevent people like himself from going into the water. Such measures, as I shall later recount in detail, had already been considered by the Council.

11. The case has therefore proceeded upon a concession that the relevant duty, if any, is that to a trespasser under section 1(4) of the 1984 Act and not to a lawful visitor under section 2(2) of the 1957 Act. On one analysis, this is a rather odd hypothesis. Mr Tomlinson's complaint is that he should have been prevented or discouraged from going into the water, that is to say, from turning himself into a trespasser. Logically, it can be said, that duty must have been owed to him (if at all) while he was still a lawful visitor. Once he had become a trespasser, it could not have meaningful effect. In the Court of Appeal, Longmore LJ was puzzled by this paradox:

"At what point does he become a trespasser? When he starts to paddle, intending thereafter to swim? There was no evidence that Mr Tomlinson in fact swam at all. He dived from a position in which swimming was difficult, if not impossible. I would be troubled if the respondents' duty of care differed depending on the precise moment when a swim could be said to have begun."

12. In the later case of Donoghue v Folkestone Properties Ltd [2003] 2 WLR 1138, 1150 Lord Phillips of Worth Matravers MR said that he shared these reservations about the concession:

> "What was at issue in the case was whether the Council should have taken steps which would have prevented Mr Tomlinson from entering the lake, that is, whether a duty of care was owed to him before he did the unauthorised act."

13. As a matter of logic, I see the force of these observations. But I have nevertheless come to the conclusion that the concession was rightly made. The duty under the 1984 Act was intended to be a lesser duty, as to both incidence and scope, than the duty to a lawful visitor under the 1957 Act. That was because Parliament recognised that it would often be unduly burdensome to require landowners to take steps to protect the safety of people who came upon their land without invitation or permission. They should not ordinarily be able to force duties upon unwilling hosts. In the application of that principle, I can see no difference between a person who comes upon land without permission and one who, having come with permission, does something which he has not been given permission to do. In both cases, the entrant would be imposing upon the landowner a duty of care which he has not expressly or impliedly accepted. The 1984 Act provides that even in such cases a duty may exist, based simply upon occupation of land and knowledge or foresight that unauthorised persons may come upon the land or authorised persons may use it for unauthorised purposes. But that duty is rarer and different in quality from the duty which arises from express or implied invitation or permission to come upon the land and use it.

14. In addition, I think that the concession is supported by the high authority of Lord Atkin in Hillen v ICI (Alkali) Ltd [1936] AC 65. There too, it could be said that the stevedores' complaint was that they should have been warned not to go upon the hatch cover and that logically this duty was owed to them, if at all, when they were lawfully on the barge.

15. I would certainly agree with Longmore LJ that the incidence and content of the duty should not depend on the precise moment at which Mr Tomlinson crossed the line between the status of lawful visitor and that of trespasser. But there is no dispute that the act in respect of which Mr Tomlinson says that he was owed a duty, namely, diving into the water, was to his knowledge prohibited by the terms upon which he had been admitted to the Park. It is, I think, for this reason that the Council owed him no duty under the 1957 Act and that the incidence and content of any duty they may have owed was governed by the 1984 Act. But I shall later return to the question of whether it would have made any difference if swimming had not been prohibited and the 1957 Act had applied.

16. It is therefore necessary to consider the conditions which section 1(3) of the 1984 Act requires to be satisfied in order that any duty under section 1(4) should exist. But before looking at the statutory requirements, I must say something more about the history of the lake, upon which Mr Braithwaite QC, who appeared for Mr Tomlinson, placed great reliance in support of his submission that the Council owed him a duty with which it failed to comply.

The history of the lake

17. The working of the sand quarry ceased in about 1975 and for some years thereafter the land lay derelict. People went there for barbecues, camp fires, open air parties and swimming. The Borough Council bought the land in 1980 and most of the work of landscaping and planting was finished by 1983. The land was reclaimed for municipal recreation. But the traditions established in the previous anarchic state of nature were hard to eradicate. From the beginning, the County Council's Management Plan treated swimming as an "unacceptable water activity". The minutes of the County Council's Advisory Group of interested organisations (anglers, windsurfers and so forth) record that on 21 November 1983 the managers proposed to put up more signs to dissuade swimmers: "The risk of a fatality to swimmers was stressed and agreed by all". The windsurfers in particular were concerned about swimmers getting in their way; perhaps being injured by a fast-moving board. The chairman summed up by saying that although the lake with its sandy beaches was a great attraction to visitors, it was also a management problem because of misuse and dangerous activities on the water.

18. In the following year, 1984, the management reported that larger notice boards had prevented the swimming problem from getting any worse: "Every reasonable precaution had now been taken, but it was recognised that some foolhardy persons would continue to put their lives at risk."

19. The management report for 1988 stated that a major concern was?

> "the unauthorised use of the lake and the increasing possibility of an accident; this is swimming and the use of rubber boats. Warnings are ignored by large numbers who see Brereton as easy, free access to open water. On busy days the overwhelming numbers make it impossible to control this use of the lake, and it is difficult to see how the situation can change unless the whole concept of managing the park and the lake is revised."

20. In 1990 there was an inspection by Mr Victor Tyler-Jones, the County Council's Water Safety Officer. He reported that the swimming problem continued, due to the ease of access, the grassy lakeside picnic areas and the beaches and the long history of swimming in the lake. His recommendation was to reduce the beach areas by planting them with reeds. His guidelines for the entire county said that swimming in lakes, rivers and ponds should be discouraged:

> "We do not recommend swimming as a suitable activity for any of our managed sites. Potential swimmers could be dissuaded by noticeboard reference to less pleasant features e.g. soft muddy bottom, danger of contracting Weil's Disease, presence of blue-green algae."

If this did not have the desired effect, ballast should be dumped on beaches and banks to make them muddy and unattractive and reeds and shrubs should be planted.

21. The money to implement these recommendations had to be provided by the Borough Council, which was under some financial pressure. But impetus was provided in the summer of 1992 by a number of incidents. Over Whitsuntide there were three cases of "near drowning resulting in hospital visits". The only such incident of which more details are available concerned a man who "was swimming in lake, after drinking, and got into difficulty". He was rescued by a relative, resuscitated by an off-duty paramedic and taken to hospital. Two men cut their heads by hitting them on something when diving into the lake; there is no information about where they dived. Mr Kitching, the County Council's Countryside Manager, prepared a paper for the Borough Council at the end of the first week in June. He said that the Park had become very popular:

> "The total number of visitors now exceeds 160,000 per annum...The lake acts as a magnet to the public and has become heavily used for swimming in spite of a no swimming policy due to safety considerations...Advice has been sought from the County Council's Water Safety Officer as to how the problem should be addressed and this has been carefully followed. Notices are posted warning of the dangers and leaflets are handed to visitors to emphasise the situation. Life belts and throwing lines are provided for use in emergencies.
> In spite of these actions the public continue to ignore the advice and the requests of the rangers not to swim. The attitude is that they will do what they want to do and that rangers should not interfere with their enjoyment. There have been several occasions when small children have been out in the middle of the lake and their parents have been extremely rude to staff when approached about this.
> As a result of the general flaunting of the policy there have been a number of near fatalities in the lake with three incidents requiring hospital treatment in the week around Whitsun. Whilst the rangers are doing all they can to protect the public it is likely to be only a matter of time before someone drowns."

22. In July 1992 the Borough Council's Leisure Officer visited the Park and concluded that the notices and leaflets were not having the desired effect. On 23 July 1992 he proposed to other officers the preparation of a report to the Borough Council recommending the adoption of Mr Tyler-Jones's scheme for making the beaches less hospitable to visitors:

> "I want the water's edge to be far less accessible, desirable and inviting than it currently is for children's beach/water's edge type of play activities. I personally find this course of action a regrettable one but I have to remind myself that Council policy was to establish a Country Park and not specifically to provide a swimming facility, no matter how popular this may have become in consequence. To provide a facility that is open to the public and which contains beach and water areas is, in my view, an open invitation and temptation to swim and engage in other water's edge activities despite the cautionary note that is struck by deterrent notices etc., and in that type of situation accidents become inevitable. We must therefore do everything that is reasonably possible to deter, discourage and prevent people from swimming or paddling in the lake or diving into the lake...Work should be prepared for the report with a view to implementation of a scheme at the earliest opportunity, bearing in mind that we shall require a supplementary estimate for the exercise."

23. As a result of this proposal, the Borough Leisure Officer was asked to prepare a feasibility report with costings. £5,000 was provided in the draft estimates for the Borough's Amenities and Leisure Services Committee, but it was one of many items deleted at the Committee's meeting on 1 March 1993 to achieve a total saving of £200,000. In 1994, the officers tried again. It was listed as a "desirable" growth bid in the budget (below "essential" and "highly desirable"). But the bid failed. When it came to the 1995 budget round, the officers presented a strongly-worded proposal:

> "Cheshire Countryside Management Service has now taken all reasonable steps with regard to providing information and attempting to educate the public about the dangers of bathing in the lake. This has had a limited effect on the numbers entering the water for short periods but there are still numbers of people, including young children, swimming, paddling and using inflatable rafts and dinghies whenever the weather is warm and sunny. We have on average three or four near drownings every year and it is only a matter of time before someone dies.

The recommendation from the National Safety Water Committee, endorsed by County Councils, is that something must now be done to reduce the 'beach areas' both in size and attractiveness. If nothing is done about this and someone dies the Borough Council is likely to be held liable and would have to accept responsibility."

24. The Borough Council found this persuasive and in 1995 £5,000 was allocated to the scheme. But the work had not yet begun when Mr Tomlinson had his accident. At that time, the beach to which he and his friends had been accustomed to go since childhood was still there. The diggers, graders and planters arrived to destroy it a few months later.

The scope of the duty under the 1984 Act

25. The conditions in section 1(3) of the 1984 Act determine whether or not a duty is owed to "another" in respect of "any such risk as is referred to in subsection (1)". Two conclusions follow from this language. First, the risks in respect of which the Act imposes a duty are limited to those mentioned in subsection (1)(a) - risks of injury "by reason of any danger due to the state of the premises or to things done or omitted to be done on them." The Act is not concerned with risks due to anything else. Secondly, the conditions have to be satisfied in respect of the claimant as "another"; that is to say, in respect of a class of persons which includes him and a description of risk which includes that which caused his injury.

A danger "due to the state of the premises"

26. The first question, therefore, is whether there was a risk within the scope of the statute; a danger "due to the state of the premises or to things done or omitted to be done on them". The judge found that there was "nothing about the mere at Brereton Heath which made it any more dangerous than any other ordinary stretch of open water in England". There was nothing special about its configuration; there were no hidden dangers. It was shallow in some places and deep in others, but that is the nature of lakes. Nor was the Council doing or permitting anything to be done which created a danger to persons who came to the lake. No power boats or jet skis threatened the safety of either lawful windsurfers or unlawful swimmers. So the Council submits that there was no danger attributable to the state of premises or things done or omitted on them. In Donoghue v Folkestone Properties Ltd [2003] 2 WLR 1138, 1153 Lord Phillips of Worth Matravers MR expressed the same opinion. He said that he had been unable to identify the "state of the premises" which carried with it the risk of the injury suffered by Mr Tomlinson:

> "It seems to me that Mr Tomlinson suffered his injury because he chose to indulge in an activity which had inherent dangers, not because the premises were in a dangerous state."

27. In making this comment, the Master of the Rolls was identifying a point which is in my opinion central to this appeal. It is relevant at a number of points in the analysis of the duties under the 1957 and 1984 Acts. Mr Tomlinson was a person of full capacity who voluntarily and without any pressure or inducement engaged in an activity which had inherent risk. The risk was that he might not execute his dive properly and so sustain injury. Likewise, a person who goes mountaineering incurs the risk that he might stumble or misjudge where to put his weight. In neither case can the risk be attributed to the state of the premises. Otherwise any premises can be said to be dangerous to someone who chooses to use them for some dangerous activity. In the present case, Mr Tomlinson knew the lake well and even if he had not, the judge's finding was that it contained no dangers which one would not have expected. So the only risk arose out of what he chose to do and not out of the state of the premises.

28. Mr Braithwaite was inclined to accept the difficulty of establishing that the risk was due to the state of the premises. He therefore contended that it was due to "things done or omitted to be done" on the premises. When asked what these might be, he said that they consisted in the attraction of the lake and the Council's inadequate attempts to keep people out of the water. The Council, he said, were "luring people into a deathtrap". Ward LJ said that the water was "a siren call strong enough to turn stout men's minds". In my opinion this is gross hyperbole. The trouble with the island of the Sirens was not the state of the premises. It was that the Sirens held mariners spellbound until they died of hunger. The beach, give or take a fringe of human bones, was an ordinary Mediterranean beach. If Odysseus had gone ashore and accidentally drowned himself having a swim, Penelope would have had no action against the Sirens for luring him there with their songs. Likewise in this case, the water was perfectly safe for all normal activities. In my opinion "things done or omitted to be done" means activities or the lack of precautions which cause risk, like allowing speedboats among the swimmers. It is a mere circularity to say that a failure to stop people getting into the water was an omission which gave rise to a duty to take steps to stop people from getting into the water.

29. It follows that in my opinion, there was no risk to Mr Tomlinson due to the state of the premises or anything done or omitted upon the premises. That means that there was no risk of a kind which gave rise to a duty under the 1957 or 1984 Acts. I shall nevertheless go on to consider the matter on the assumption that there was.

The conditions for the existence of a duty

(i) Knowledge or foresight of the danger

30. Section 1(3) has three conditions which must be satisfied. First, under paragraph (a), the occupier must be aware of the danger or have reasonable grounds to believe that it exists. For this purpose, it is necessary to say what the relevant danger was. The judge thought it was the risk of suffering an injury through diving and said that the Council was aware of this danger because two men had suffered minor head injuries from diving in May 1992. In the Court of Appeal, Ward LJ described the relevant risk much more broadly. He regarded all the swimming incidents as indicative of the Council's knowledge that a danger existed. I am inclined to think that this is too wide a description. The risk of injury from diving off the beach was in my opinion different from the risk of drowning in the deep water. For example, the Council might have fenced off the deep water or marked it with buoys and left people to paddle in the shallows. That would have reduced the risk of drowning but would not have prevented the injury to Mr Tomlinson. We know very little about the circumstances in which two men suffered minor cuts to their heads in 1992 and I am not sure that they really provide much support for an inference that there was knowledge, or reasonable grounds to believe, that the beach posed a risk of serious diving injury. Dr Penny, a consultant occupational health and safety physician with long experience of advising organisations involved in acquatic sports (and himself a diver) said that the Code of Safety for Beaches, published in 1993 by the Royal Life Saving Society and the Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents, made no mention of diving risks, no doubt assuming that, because there was little possibility of high diving from a beach, the risk of serious diving injuries was very small compared with the risk of drowning. I accept that the Council must have known that there was a possibility that some boisterous teenager would injure himself by horseplay in the shallows and I would not disturb the concurrent findings that this was sufficient to satisfy paragraph (a). But the chances of such an accident were small. I shall return later, in connection with condition (c), to the relevance of where the risk comes on the scale of probability.

(ii) Knowledge or foresight of the presence of the trespasser

31. Once it is found that the risk of a swimmer injuring himself by diving was something of which the Council knew or which they had reasonable grounds to believe to exist, paragraph (b) presents no difficulty. The Council plainly knew that swimmers came to the lake and Mr Tomlinson fell within that class.

(iii) Reasonable to expect protection

32. That leaves paragraph (c). Was the risk one against which the Council might reasonably be expected to offer the claimant some protection? The judge found that "the danger and risk of injury from diving in the lake where it was shallow were obvious." In such a case the judge held, both as a matter of common sense and following consistent authority (Staples v West Dorset District Council [1995] PIQR 439; Ratcliff v McConnell [1999] 1 WLR 670; Darby v National Trust [2001] PIQR 372), that there was no duty to warn against the danger. A warning would not tell a swimmer anything he did not already know. Nor was it necessary to do anything else. "I do not think", said the judge, "that the defendants' legal duty to the claimant in the circumstances required them to take the extreme measures which were completed after the accident". Even if Mr Tomlinson had been owed a duty under the 1957 Act as a lawful visitor, the Council would not have been obliged to do more than they did.

33. The Court of Appeal disagreed. Ward LJ said that the Council was obliged to do something more. The gravity of the risk, the number of people who regularly incurred it and the attractiveness of the beach created a duty. The prohibition on swimming was obviously ineffectual and therefore it was necessary to take additional steps to prevent or discourage people from getting into the water. Sedley LJ said: "It is only where the risk is so obvious that the occupier can safely assume that nobody will take it that there will be no liability." Longmore LJ dissented. The majority reduced the damages by two-thirds to reflect Mr Tomlinson's contributory negligence, although Ward LJ said that he would have been inclined to reduce them only by half. The Council appeals against the finding of liability and Mr Tomlinson appeals against the apportionment, which he says should have been in accordance with the view of Ward LJ.

The balance of risk, gravity of injury, cost and social value.

34. My Lords, the majority of the Court of Appeal appear to have proceeded on the basis that if there was a foreseeable risk of serious injury, the Council was under a duty to do what was necessary to prevent it. But this in my opinion is an oversimplification. Even in the case of the duty owed to a lawful visitor under section 2(2) of the 1957 Act and even if the risk had been attributable to the state of the premises rather than the acts of Mr Tomlinson, the question of what amounts to "such care as in all the circumstances of the case is reasonable" depends upon assessing, as in the case of common law negligence, not only the likelihood that someone may be injured and the seriousness of the injury which may occur, but also the social value of the activity which gives rise to the risk and the cost of preventative measures. These factors have to be balanced against each other.

35. For example, in Overseas Tankship (UK) Ltd v Miller Steamship Pty Ltd (The Wagon Mound (No. 2)) [1967] 1 AC 617 , there was no social value or cost saving in the defendant's activity. Lord Reid said (at p 643):

> "In the present case there was no justification whatever for discharging the oil into Sydney Harbour. Not only was it an offence to do so, but it involved considerable loss financially. If the ship's engineer had thought about the matter, there could have been no question of balancing the advantages and disadvantages. From every point of view it was both his duty and his interest to stop the discharge immediately."

36. So the defendants were held liable for damage which was only a very remote possibility. Similarly in Jolley v Sutton London B.C. [2000] 1 WLR 1082 there was no social value or cost saving to the Council in creating a risk by leaving a derelict boat lying about. It was something which they ought to have removed whether it created a risk of injury or not. So they were held liable for an injury which, though foreseeable, was not particularly likely. On the other hand, in The Wagon Mound (No. 2) Lord Reid (at p. 642) drew a contrast with Bolton v Stone [1951] AC 850 in which the House of Lords held that it was not negligent for a cricket club to do nothing about the risk of someone being injured by a cricket ball hit out of the ground. The difference was that the cricket club were carrying on a lawful and socially useful activity and would have had to stop playing cricket at that ground.

37. This is the kind of balance which has to be struck even in a situation in which it is clearly fair, just and reasonable that there should in principle be a duty of care or in which Parliament, as in the 1957 Act, has decreed that there should be. And it may lead to the conclusion that even though injury is foreseeable, as it was in Bolton v Stone, it is still in all the circumstances reasonable to do nothing about it.

The 1957 and 1984 Acts contrasted

38. In the case of the 1984 Act, there is the additional consideration that unless in all the circumstances it is reasonable to expect the occupier to do something, that is to say, to "offer the other some protection", there is no duty at all. One may ask what difference there is between the case in which the claimant is a lawful visitor and there is in principle a duty under the 1957 Act but on the particular facts no duty to do anything, and the case in which he is a trespasser and there is on the particular facts no duty under the 1984 Act. Of course in such a case the result is the same. But Parliament has made it clear that in the case of a lawful visitor, one starts from the assumption that there is a duty whereas in the case of a trespasser one starts from the assumption that there is none.

The balance under the 1957 Act

39. My Lords, it will in the circumstances be convenient to consider first the question of what the position would have been if Mr Tomlinson had been a lawful visitor owed a duty under section 2(2) of the 1957 Act. Assume, therefore, that there had been no prohibition on swimming. What was the risk of serious injury? To some extent this depends upon what one regards as the relevant risk. As I have mentioned, the judge thought it was the risk of injury through diving while the Court of Appeal thought it was any kind of injury which could happen to people in the water. Although, as I have said, I am inclined to agree with the judge, I do not want to put the basis of my decision too narrowly. So I accept that we are concerned with the steps, if any, which should have been taken to prevent any kind of water accident. According to the Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents, about 450 people drown while swimming in the United Kingdom every year (see Darby v National Trust [2001] PIQR 372, 374). About 25-35 break their necks diving and no doubt others sustain less serious injuries. So there is obviously some degree of risk in swimming and diving, as there is in climbing, cycling, fell walking and many other such activities.

40. I turn then to the cost of taking preventative measures. Ward LJ described it (£5,000) as "not excessive". Perhaps it was not, although the outlay has to be seen in the context of the other items (rated "essential" and "highly desirable") in the Borough Council budget which had taken precedence over the destruction of the beaches for the previous two years.

41. I do not however regard the financial cost as a significant item in the balancing exercise which the court has to undertake. There are two other related considerations which are far more important. The first is the social value of the activities which would have to be prohibited in order to reduce or eliminate the risk from swimming. And the second is the question of whether the Council should be entitled to allow people of full capacity to decide for themselves whether to take the risk.

42. The Court of Appeal made no reference at all to the social value of the activities which were to be prohibited. The majority of people who went to the beaches to sunbathe, paddle and play with their children were enjoying themselves in a way which gave them pleasure and caused no risk to themselves or anyone else. This must be something to be taken into account in deciding whether it was reasonable to expect the Council to destroy the beaches.

43. I have the impression that the Court of Appeal felt able to brush these matters aside because the Council had already decided to do the work. But they were held liable for having failed to do so before Mr Tomlinson's accident and the question is therefore whether they were under a legal duty to do so. Ward LJ placed much emphasis upon the fact that the Council had decided to destroy the beaches and that its officers thought that this was necessary to avoid being held liable for an accident to a swimmer. But the fact that the Council's safety officers thought that the work was necessary does not show that there was a legal duty to do it. In Darby v National Trust [2001] PIQR 372 the claimant's husband was tragically drowned while swimming in a pond on the National Trust estate at Hardwick Hall. Miss Rebecca Kirkwood, the Water and Leisure Safety Consultant to the Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents, gave uncontradicted evidence, which the judge accepted, that the pond was unsuitable for swimming because it was deep in the middle and the edges were uneven. The National Trust should have made it clear that swimming in the pond was not allowed and taken steps to enforce the prohibition. But May LJ said robustly that it was for the court, not Miss Kirkwood, to decide whether the Trust was under a legal duty to take such steps. There was no duty because the risks from swimming in the pond were perfectly obvious.

Free will

44. The second consideration, namely the question of whether people should accept responsibility for the risks they choose to run, is the point made by Lord Phillips of Worth Matravers MR in Donoghue v Folkestone Properties Ltd [2003] 2 WLR 1138, 1153 and which I said was central to this appeal. Mr Tomlinson was freely and voluntarily undertaking an activity which inherently involved some risk. By contrast, Miss Bessie Stone, to whom the House of Lords held that no duty was owed, was innocently standing on the pavement outside her garden gate at 10 Beckenham Road, Cheetham when she was struck by a ball hit for 6 out of the Cheetham Cricket Club ground. She was certainly not engaging in any activity which involved an inherent risk of such injury. So compared with Bolton v Stone, this is an a fortiori case.

45. I think it will be extremely rare for an occupier of land to be under a duty to prevent people from taking risks which are inherent in the activities they freely choose to undertake upon the land. If people want to climb mountains, go hang gliding or swim or dive in ponds or lakes, that is their affair. Of course the landowner may for his own reasons wish to prohibit such activities. He may be think that they are a danger or inconvenience to himself or others. Or he may take a paternalist view and prefer people not to undertake risky activities on his land. He is entitled to impose such conditions, as the Council did by prohibiting swimming. But the law does not require him to do so.

46. My Lords, as will be clear from what I have just said, I think that there is an important question of freedom at stake. It is unjust that the harmless recreation of responsible parents and children with buckets and spades on the beaches should be prohibited in order to comply with what is thought to be a legal duty to safeguard irresponsible visitors against dangers which are perfectly obvious. The fact that such people take no notice of warnings cannot create a duty to take other steps to protect them. I find it difficult to express with appropriate moderation my disagreement with the proposition of Sedley LJ (at para. 45) that it is "only where the risk is so obvious that the occupier can safely assume that nobody will take it that there will be no liability". A duty to protect against obvious risks or self-inflicted harm exists only in cases in which there is no genuine and informed choice, as in the case of employees, or some lack of capacity, such as the inability of children to recognise danger (British Railways Board v Herrington [1972] AC 877) or the despair of prisoners which may lead them to inflict injury on themselves (Reeves v Commissioner of Police [2000] 1 AC 360).

47. It is of course understandable that organisations like the Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents should favour policies which require people to be prevented from taking risks. Their function is to prevent accidents and that is one way of doing so. But they do not have to consider the cost, not only in money but also in deprivation of liberty, which such restrictions entail. The courts will naturally respect the technical expertise of such organisations in drawing attention to what can be done to prevent accidents. But the balance between risk on the one hand and individual autonomy on the other is not a matter of expert opinion. It is a judgment which the courts must make and which in England reflects the individualist values of the common law.

48. As for the Council officers, they were obvious motivated by the view that it was necessary to take defensive measures to prevent the Council from being held liable to pay compensation. The Borough Leisure Officer said that he regretted the need to destroy the beaches but saw no alternative if the Council was not to be held liable for an accident to a swimmer. So this appeal gives your Lordships the opportunity to say clearly that local authorities and other occupiers of land are ordinarily under no duty to incur such social and financial costs to protect a minority (or even a majority) against obvious dangers. On the other hand, if the decision of the Court of Appeal were left standing, every such occupier would feel obliged to take similar defensive measures. Sedley LJ was able to say that if the logic of the Court of Appeal's decision was that other public lakes and ponds required similar precautions, "so be it". But I cannot view this prospect with the same equanimity. In my opinion it would damage the quality of many people's lives.

49. In the particular case of diving injuries, there is little evidence that such defensive measures have had much effect. Dr Penny, the Council's expert, said that over the past decade there had been little change in the rate of serious diving accidents. Each year, as I have mentioned, there are about 25-35 fracture-dislocations of the neck. Almost all those affected are males and their average age is consistently around 25 years. In spite of greatly increased safety measures, particularly in swimming pools, the numbers (when Dr Penny gave evidence) had remained the same for a decade:

> "This is probably because of the sudden, unpredictable nature of these dangerous dives, undertaken mostly by boisterous young men...hence the common description the "Macho Male Diving Syndrome."

50. My Lords, for these reasons I consider that even if swimming had not been prohibited and the Council had owed a duty under section 2(2) of the 1957, that duty would not have required them to take any steps to prevent Mr Tomlinson from diving or warning him against dangers which were perfectly obvious. If that is the case, then plainly there can have been no duty under the 1984 Act. The risk was not one against which he was entitled under section 1(3)(c) to protection. I would therefore allow the appeal and restore the decision of Jack J. It follows that the cross-appeal against the apportionment of damages must be dismissed.

LORD HUTTON

My Lords,

51. I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech of my noble and learned friend Lord Hoffmann and I gratefully adopt his account of the background facts to the tragic injury which Mr Tomlinson suffered in the lake in Brereton Heath Country Park in Cheshire. I agree with your Lordships that the appeal brought by Congleton Borough Council and Cheshire County Council should be allowed, but as I was attracted for a considerable time during the hearing of the appeal by the respondent's argument supporting the reasoning of Ward LJ in the Court of Appeal (with which Sedley LJ agreed) that Mr Tomlinson was entitled to recover damages, I wish to add some observations of my own.

52. I approach the case on the basis that Mr Tomlinson was, in strict law, a trespasser at the time he dived and struck his head on the bottom of the lake. It is clear that he was invited by the appellants to come to the country park but it is also clear that swimming in the lake was expressly prohibited by the appellants and, as the trial judge found, Mr Tomlinson was fully aware of this prohibition. Therefore when he began to dive he became a trespasser because, as Lord Atkin stated in Hillen and Pettigrew v ICI (Alkali) Ltd [1936] AC 65, 69:

> "So far as he sets foot on so much of the premises as lie outside the invitation or uses them for purposes which are alien to the invitation he is not an invitee but a trespasser, and his rights must be determined accordingly."

However I agree with Lord Hoffmann that even if the respondent had not been a trespasser at the time of his dive but had been a visitor within the meaning of the Occupiers' Liability Act 1957, he would still not have been entitled to recover damages.

53. In relation to section 1(1)(a) of the Occupiers' Liability Act 1984 I recognise that there is force in the argument that the injury was not due to the state of the premises but was due to the respondent's own lack of care in diving into shallow water. But the trial judge found that Mr Tomlinson could not see the bottom of the lake and, on balance, I incline to the view that dark and murky water which prevents a person seeing the bottom of the lake where he is diving can be viewed as "the state of the premises" and that if he sustains injury through striking his head on the bottom which he cannot see this can be viewed as a danger "due to the state of the premises". If water were allowed to become dark and murky in an indoor swimming pool provided by a local authority and a diver struck his head on the bottom I consider that the danger could be regarded as "due to the state of the premises", and whilst there is an obvious difference between such water and water in a lake which in its natural state is dark and murky, I think that the term "the state of the premises" can be applied both to the swimming pool and to the lake.

54. Section 1(3) and (4) provide:

> "(3) An occupier of premises owes a duty to another (not being his visitor) in respect of any such risk as is referred to in subsection (1) above if—
> (b) he knows or has reasonable grounds to believe that the other is in the vicinity of the danger concerned or that he may come into the vicinity of the danger (in either case, whether the other has lawful authority for being in that vicinity or not); and
> (4) Where, by virtue of this section, an occupier of premises owes a duty to another in respect of such a risk, the duty is to take such care as is reasonable in all the circumstances of the case to see that he does not suffer injury on the premises by reason of the danger concerned."

55. There is no doubt from the reports and proposals of the appellants' officials to the Borough's Amenities and Leisure Services Committee and to the Borough Council which Lord Hoffmann has described that paragraphs (a) and (b) of section 1(3) are satisfied. If section 1(3) were satisfied and the risk was one against which, in all the circumstances of the case, the appellants might reasonably be expected to offer the respondent some protection, I consider that there would be an argument of some force that they were in breach of the duty specified in section 1(4), because the minutes of the meetings showed that they knew that there were dangers to persons swimming or diving in the lake (there had been two cases of swimmers sustaining head injuries) and they knew that the dangers might lead to death or serious injury, but they had decided not to take the recommended steps such as planting reeds on the beach, which would probably have stopped swimming, because of financial constraints, although the cost of these precautionary measures would have been only in the region of £15,000.

56. Therefore I think the crucial question is whether the respondent has established that the risk was one to which section 1(3)(c) applies. On this point the reasoning of Ward LJ was contained in paragraph 29 of his judgment:

> "Here the authorities employed rangers whose duty it was to give oral warnings against swimming albeit that this met with mixed success and sometimes attracted abuse for their troubles. In addition to the oral warnings, the rangers would hand out safety leaflets which warned of the variable depth in the pond, the cold, the weeds, the absence of rescue services, waterborne diseases and the risk of accidents occurring. It seems to me that the rangers' patrols and advice and the handing out of these leaflets reinforced the ineffective message on the sign and constituted 'some protection' in fact given and reasonably expected to be offered in the circumstances of this case."

57. I thought for a time that this reasoning was persuasive, but I have concluded that it should not be accepted because I consider that it is contrary to a principle stated in the older authorities which is still good law. In Stevenson v Glasgow Corporation 1908 SC 1034, 1039 Lord M'Laren stated:

> "in a town, as well as in the country, there are physical features which may be productive of injury to careless persons or to young children against which it is impossible to guard by protective measures. The situation of a town on the banks of a river is a familiar feature; and whether the stream be sluggish like the Clyde at Glasgow, or swift and variable like the Ness at Inverness, or the Tay at Perth, there is always danger to the individual who may be so unfortunate as to fall into the stream. But in none of these places has it been found necessary to fence the river to prevent children or careless persons from falling into the water. Now, as the common law is just the formal statement of the results and conclusions of the common sense of mankind, I come without difficulty to the conclusion that precautions which have been rejected by common sense as unnecessary and inconvenient are not required by the law."

58. In Glasgow Corporation v Taylor [1922] 1 AC 44, 61 Lord Shaw of Dunfermline stated:

> "Grounds thrown open by a municipality to the public may contain objects of natural beauty, say precipitous cliffs or the banks of streams, the dangers of the resort to which are plain."

Lord Shaw then cited with approval the words of Lord M'Laren in Stevenson that "in a town, as well as in the country, there are physical features which may be productive of injury to careless persons or to young children against which it is impossible to guard by protective measures". I think that when Lord M'Laren referred to physical features against which "it is impossible to guard by protective measures" he was not referring to protective measures which it is physically impossible to put in place; rather he had in mind measures which the common sense of mankind indicates as being unnecessary to take. This statement echoed the observation of the Lord President in Hastie v Magistrates of Edinburgh 1907 SC 1102, 1106 that there are certain risks against which the law, in accordance with the dictates of common sense, does not give protection— such risks are "just one of the results of the world as we find it".

Stevenson and Hastie (which were not concerned with trespassers) were decided almost a century ago and the judgments are couched in old-fashioned language, but I consider that they express a principle which is still valid today, namely, that it is contrary to common sense, and therefore not sound law, to expect an occupier to provide protection against an obvious danger on his land arising from a natural feature such as a lake or a cliff and to impose a duty on him to do so. In my opinion this principle, although not always explicitly stated, underlies the cases relied on by the appellants where it has been held that the occupier is not liable where a person has injured himself or drowned in an inland lake or pool or in the sea or on some natural feature.

60. In Cotton v Derbyshire Dales District Council (20 June, 1994, unreported) the Court of Appeal upheld the decision of the trial judge dismissing the plaintiff's claim for damages for serious injuries sustained from falling off a cliff. Applying the judgment of Lord Shaw in Glasgow Corporation v Taylor the Court of Appeal held that the occupiers were under no duty to provide protection against dangers which are themselves obvious.

61. In Whyte v Redland Aggregates Ltd [1997] EWCA Civ 2842 the appellant dived into a disused gravel pit and alleged that he had struck his head on an obstruction on the floor of the pit. The Court of Appeal dismissed his appeal against the judgment of the trial judge who held that he was not entitled to damages. Henry LJ stated:

> "In my judgment, the occupier of land containing or bordered by the river, the seashore, the pond or the gravel pit, does not have to warn of uneven surfaces below the water. Such surfaces are by their nature quite likely to be uneven. Diving where you cannot see the bottom clearly enough to know that it is safe to dive is dangerous unless you have made sure, by reconnaissance or otherwise, that the diving is safe ie. that there is adequate depth at the place where you choose to dive. In those circumstances, the dangers of there being an uneven surface in an area where you cannot plainly see the bottom are too plain to require a specific warning and, accordingly, there is no such duty to warn (see Lord Shaw in Glasgow Corporation v Taylor [1922] 1 AC 44, 60. There was no trap here on the judge's finding. There was just an uneven surface, as one would expect to find in a disused gravel pit."

62. In Bartrum v Hepworth Minerals & Chemicals Limited, unreported, the claimant dived from a ledge on a cliff. In order to avoid shallow water he knew that he had to dive out into the pool but he failed to do so and fractured his neck. Turner J dismissed his claim for damages and stated:

> "So far as the Act is concerned, by section 1(3) the defendants were under a duty to those whom they had reasonable grounds to believe would be in the vicinity of the danger, that is on the cliff for the purpose of diving, and the risk was one which, in all the circumstances, [they] may be reasonably expected to offer some protection. In my judgment the danger here was so obvious to any adult that it was not reasonably to be expected of the defendants that they would offer any protection."

63. In Darby v National Trust [2001] PIQR 372 the claimant's husband was drowned whilst swimming in a pond on National Trust property. The Court of Appeal allowed an appeal by the National Trust against the trial judge's finding of liability and May LJ stated at p 378:

> "It cannot be the duty of the owner of every stretch of coastline to have notices warning of the dangers of swimming in the sea. If it were so, the coast would have to be littered with notices in places other than those where there are known to be special dangers which are not obvious. The same would apply to all inland lakes and reservoirs. In my judgment there was no duty on the National Trust on the facts of this case to warn against swimming in this pond where the dangers of drowning were no other or greater than those which were quite obvious to any adult such as the unfortunate deceased. That, in my view, applies as much to the risk that a swimmer might get into difficulties from the temperature of the water as to the risk that he might get into difficulties from mud or sludge on the bottom of the pond."

64. I also think that the principle stated by Lord M'Laren in Stevenson is implicit in paragraph 34 of the judgment of Lord Phillips of Worth Matravers MR in Donoghue v Folkestone Properties Ltd [2003] 2 WLR 1138. In that case the claimant dived from a slipway into Folkestone harbour after midnight in mid-winter. He struck his head on a grid pile under the water adjacent to the harbour wall and broke his neck. The Court of Appeal allowed an appeal by the defendant against the trial judge's finding of liability. The Master of the Rolls stated at pages 1147-1148:

> "33 The obvious situation where a duty under the 1984 Act is likely to arise is where the occupier knows that a trespasser may come upon a danger that is latent. In such a case the trespasser may be exposed to the risk of injury without realising that the danger exists. Where the state of the premises constitutes a danger that is perfectly obvious, and there is no reason for a trespasser observing it to go near it, a duty under the 1984 Act is unlikely to arise for at least two reasons. The first is that because the danger can readily be avoided, it is unlikely to pose a risk of injuring the trespasser whose presence on the premises is envisaged.
> 34 There are, however, circumstances in which it may be foreseeable that a trespasser will appreciate that a dangerous feature of premises poses a risk of injury, but will nevertheless deliberately court the danger and risk the injury. It seems to me that, at least where the individual is an adult, it will be rare that those circumstances will be such that the occupier can reasonably be expected to offer some protection to the trespasser against the risk."

Lord Phillips then went on to state that where a person was tempted by some natural feature of the occupier's land to engage in some activity such as mountaineering which carried a risk of injury, he could not ascribe to "the state of the premises" an injury sustained in carrying on that activity. However in the present case, as I have stated, I incline to the view that the dark and murky water can be viewed as "the state of the premises".

65. Therefore I consider that the risk of the respondent striking his head on the bottom of the lake was not one against which the appellants might reasonably have been expected to offer him some protection, and accordingly they are not liable to him because they owed him no duty. I would add that there might be exceptional cases where the principle stated in Stevenson and Taylor should not apply and where a claimant might be able to establish that the risk arising from some natural feature on the land was such that the occupier might reasonably be expected to offer him some protection against it, for example, where there was a very narrow and slippery path with a camber beside the edge of a cliff from which a number of persons had fallen. But the present is not such a case and, for the reasons which I have given, I consider that the appeal should be allowed.

LORD HOBHOUSE OF WOODBOROUGH

My Lords,

66. In this case the trial judge after having heard all the evidence made findings of fact which are now accepted by the claimant:

> There was nothing about the mere which made it any more dangerous than any other stretch of open water in England. Swimming and diving held their own risks. So if the mere was to be described as a danger, it was only because it attracted swimming and diving, which activities carry a risk. Despite having seen signs stating "Dangerous Water: No Swimming", the claimant ignored them. The danger and risk of injury from diving in the lake where it was shallow was obvious. At the time of the accident, the claimant was 18 years of age and had regularly been going to the park since he was a small child. He knew it well. The accident occurred when he waded into the water until the water was a little above his knees and threw himself forward in a dive or plunge. He knew that he shouldn't. He could not see the bottom. In fact it was a smooth sandy surface without any obstruction or hazard. He dived deeper than he had intended and his head hit the sandy bottom causing his injury. Besides the notices already referred to, visitors were handed leaflets warning them of the dangers of swimming in the mere. Wardens patrolled the park and told people further that they should not swim in the mere. However it was the fact that visitors often took no notice and very many people did bathe in the mere in summer.

67. The claimant has made his claim for personal injuries under the Occupiers' Liability Act 1984 on the basis that at the time that he suffered his injury he was a trespasser in that he was swimming in the mere and swimming was, as he was aware, forbidden. This seems to me to be a somewhat artificial approach to the case; since paddling was apparently allowed but not swimming and the claimant was at the material time in water which only came a little above his knees. However, under the Occupiers' Liability Act 1957 (and at common law) when an invitee or licensee breaches the conditions upon which he has entered the premises, he ceases to be a visitor and becomes a trespasser: s.2(2). The claimant was permitted to enter the park on the condition that (inter alia) he did not swim in the mere. If he should swim in the mere, he broke this condition and as a result ceased to be a visitor. However, like all of your Lordships, I consider that whether he makes his claim under the 1984 Act or the 1957 Act, he does not succeed.

68. The two Acts apply the same general policy and the 1984 Act is a supplement to the 1957 Act. The earlier Act was the result of a re-examination of the common law relating to occupiers' liability. Its primary purpose was to simplify the law. It had previously been based upon placing those coming on another's land into various different categories and then stipulating different standards of care from the occupier in respect of each category. This was the historical approach of the common law to the question of negligence and found its inspiration in Roman law concepts (as was the case in the law of bailment: Coggs v Bernard 2 Lord Raym. 909). By 1957, the dominant approach had become the 'good neighbour' principle enunciated in Donoghue v Stevenson [1932] AC 562. But special rules still applied to relationships which were not merely neighbourly. One such was occupiers' liability. The relevant, indeed, principal simplification introduced in the 1957 Act was to introduce the 'common duty of care' as a single standard covering both invitees and licensees: see s.2(2). The 1957 Act applied only to visitors, ie persons coming onto the land with the occupier's express or implied consent. It did not apply to persons who were not visitors including trespassers. The 1984 Act made provision for when a duty of care should be owed to persons who were not visitors (I will for the sake of convenience call such persons "trespassers") and what the duty should then be, that is, a duty of care in the terms of s.1(3), more narrow than that imposed by the 1957 Act. Thus the duty owed to visitors and the lesser duty which may be owed to trespassers was defined in appropriate terms. But, in each Act, there are further provisions which define the content of the duty and, depending upon the particular circumstances, its scope and extent.

69. The first and fundamental definition is to be found in both Acts. The duty is owed "in respect of dangers due to the state of the premises or to things done or omitted to be done on them". In the 1957 Act it is s.1(1). In the 1984 Act it is in s.1(1)(a) which forms the starting point for determining whether any duty is owed to the trespasser (see also s.1(3)) and provides the subject matter of any duty which may be owed. It is this phrase which provides the basic definition of 'danger' as used elsewhere in the Acts. There are two alternatives. The first is that it must be due to the state of the premises. The state of the premises is the physical features of the premises as they exist at the relevant time. It can include foot paths covered in ice and open mine shafts. It will not normally include parts of the landscape, say, steep slopes or difficult terrain in mountainous areas or cliffs close to cliff paths. There will certainly be dangers requiring care and experience from the visitor but it normally would be a misuse of language to describe such features as "the state of the premises". The same could be said about trees and, at any rate, natural lakes and rivers. The second alternative is dangers due to things done or omitted to be done on the premises. Thus if shooting is taking place on the premises, a danger to visitors may arise from that fact. If speed boats are allowed to go into an area where swimmers are, the safety of the swimmers may be endangered.

70. In the present case, the mere was used for a number of activities - angling, board-sailing, sub-aqua, canoeing and sailing model yachts - but none of these was suggested to have given rise to any danger to the claimant or others. Therefore the claimant has to found his case upon a danger due to the "state of the premises". His difficulty is that the judge has found that there was none and he has accepted that finding. Therefore his case fails in limine. If there was no such danger the remainder of the provisions of the Acts all of which depend upon the existence of such a danger cannot assist him. The claimant clearly appreciated this when he brought his claim since his Statement of Claim specifically pleaded that there had been "an obstruction under the surface of the water" on which he struck his head. The judge found that there was no such obstruction.

71. Section 2 of the 1957 Act deals with the content of the duty (if any). Thus s.2(2) defines the common duty of care as one "to take such care as in all the circumstances of the case is reasonable to see that the visitor will be reasonably safe in using the premises for the purposes for which he is invited or permitted by the occupier to be there". If swimming is not one of those purposes, the duty of care does not extend to him while he is swimming. Section 2(3) deals with what circumstances are relevant to assessing any duty owed. They include "the degree of care, and of want of care, which would ordinarily be looked for in such a visitor". Examples are given: "(a) An occupier must be prepared for children to be less careful than adults." A skilled visitor can be expected to appreciate and guard against risks ordinarily incident to his skilled activities: s.2(2)(b). An obvious instance of the second example is a steeple jack brought in to repair a spire or an electrician to deal with faulty wiring. Here, the claimant was an 18 year old youth who ought to be well able to appreciate and cope with the character of an ordinary lake. He can take care of himself; he does not need to be looked after in the same way as a child.

72. Turning to the 1984 Act, one can observe the same features. The basic requirement of a "danger due to the state of the premises" is there. Section 1(2) contains a cross-reference to s.2(2) of the earlier Act. Section 1(3) depends upon the existence, and knowledge, of a danger coming within s.1(1). The risk of personal injury arising from that danger must further be one against which, in all the circumstances, it is reasonable to expect the occupier "to offer the [trespasser] some protection". The equivalent phrase "reasonable in all the circumstances" is used in subsections (4) and (5). Subsection (5) specifically permits the use of warnings and discouragements against incurring the relevant risk.

73. It is an irony of the present case that the claimant has found it easier to put his case under the 1984 Act than under the 1957 Act and argue, in effect, that the occupier owed a higher duty to a trespasser than to a visitor. This is because the inclusion of the words in s.2(4), duty "to see that he does not suffer injury on the premises by reason of the danger concerned". The claimant did suffer injury whilst on the premises; the defendants failed to see that he did not. Whilst this argument in any event fails on account of the fundamental point that the state of the premises did not give rise to any danger, it would be perverse to construe these two Acts of Parliament so as to give the 1984 Act the effect which the claimant contends for. (See also the quotation from the Law Commission Report by Brooke LJ in his judgment in Donoghue v Folkestone Properties [2003] 2 WLR at pp.1157-8.) The key is in the circumstances and what it is reasonable to expect of the occupier. The reference to warnings and discouragements in subsection (5) and the use of the words "some protection" in subsection (3)(c) both demonstrate that the duty is not as onerous as the claimant argues. Warnings can be disregarded (as was the case here); discouragements can be evaded; the trespasser may still be injured (or injure himself) while on the premises. There is no guarantee of safety any more than there is under the 1957 Act. The question remains what is it reasonable to expect the occupier to do for unauthorised trespassers on his land. The trespasser by avoiding getting the consent of the occupier, avoids having conditions or restrictions imposed upon his entry or behaviour once on the premises. By definition, the occupier cannot control the trespasser in the same way as he can control a visitor. The Acts both lay stress upon what is reasonable in all the circumstances. Such circumstances must be relevant to the relative duties owed under the two Acts.

74. Returning to the facts of this case, what more was it reasonable to expect of the defendants beyond putting up the notices and issuing warnings and prohibitions? It will not have escaped your Lordships that the putting up of the notices prohibiting swimming is the peg which the claimant uses to acquire the status of trespasser and the benefit of the suggested more favourable duty of care under the 1984 Act. But this is a case where, as held by the judge, all the relevant characteristics of this mere were already obvious to the claimant. In these circumstances, no purpose was in fact served by the warning. It told the claimant nothing he did not already know. (Staples v W Dorset [1995] PIQR 439, Whyte v Redland (1997) EWCA Civ 2842, Ratcliffe v McConnell [1999] 1 WLR 670, Darby v National Trust [2001] PIQR 372.) The location was not one from which one could dive into water from a height. There was a shallow gradually sloping sandy beach. The bather had to wade in and the claimant knew exactly how deep the water was where he was standing with the water coming up to a little above his knees. The claimant's case is so far from giving a cause of action under the statute that it is hard to discuss coherently the hypotheses upon which it depends. There was no danger; any danger did not arise from the state of the premises; any risk of striking the bottom from diving in such shallow water was obvious; the claimant did not need to be warned against running that risk; it was not reasonable to expect the occupier to offer the claimant (or any other trespasser) any protection against that obvious risk.

75. Faced with these insuperable difficulties and with the fact that they had failed to prove the pleaded case, counsel for the claimant put the argument in a different way. They pointed to the internal reports and minutes disclosed by the defendant councils. Passing over a minute of 22nd November 1984 which under the heading "Swimming" accurately stated

> "Probably as a result of the larger notice boards the problems of swimming were no worse than in previous years and perhaps marginally better. Every reasonable precaution had now been taken, but it was recognised that some foolhardy persons would continue to put their lives at risk.", they referred to an undated report of some time in 1992 concerning swimming in the mere. It reported many instances of swimming during hot spells with up to 2,000 people present and as many as 100 in the water. It referred to the popularity of the extensive beach areas with families where children paddled and made sand castles and groups picnicked, adding "not unnaturally many [people] will venture into the water for a swim". The "hazards" pointing to the likelihood of future problems were stated to include "lakeside grassy picnic area". The recommendations were directed at the beach areas: "Suggest cutting down on beach area by increasing reed zones".

"Signs should indicate the nature of the hazard e.g. 'Danger - Water 5m. deep'. It is clear that accidents such as that suffered by the claimant were not in the writer's mind. Other similar reports are referred to in the Opinion of my noble and learned friend Lord Hoffmann and it is otiose to quote from them again.

76. In July of the same year a departmental memorandum referred to the council's policy to stop all swimming. It therefore called upon the council to engage on a scheme of landscaping to make "the water's edge to be far less accessible, desirable and inviting than it currently is for children's beach/water's edge type of play activities". The solution called for was to remove or cover over the beaches and replace them by muddy reed beds. Part of the reasoning was that with attractive beaches "accidents become inevitable" and "we must therefore do everything that is reasonably possible to deter, discourage and prevent people from swimming or paddling in the lake or diving into the lake." An estimate of cost was asked for.

77. Funds were short but in 1994 a request for finance was presented. It was based upon the public's disregard of the embargo on bathing in the lake despite having "taken all reasonable steps" to educate the public. The request states that "we have on average three or four near drownings every year and it is only a matter of time before someone dies". "If nothing is done about [the landscaping] and someone dies the Borough Council is to be held liable and would have to accept responsibility." This was the nub of the claimant's case. The situation was dangerous. The defendants realised that they should do something about it - remove the beaches and make the water's edge unattractive and not so easily accessible. They recognised that they would be liable if they did not do so. This reasoning needs to be examined.

78. The first point to be made is that the councils were always at liberty, subject to the Local Government Acts, to have and enforce a no swimming policy. Indeed this had all along been one of the factors which had driven their management of this park. Likewise, subject to the same important qualification, they were at liberty to take moral responsibility for and pay compensation for any accident that might occur in the park. It is to be doubted that this was ever, so stated, their view. But neither of these factors create any legal liability which is what is in question in the present case. If they mistakenly misunderstood what the law required of them or what their legal liabilities were, that does not make them legally liable.

79. The second point is the mistreatment of the concept of risk. To suffer a broken neck and paralysis for life could hardly be a more serious injury; any loss of life is a consequence of the greatest seriousness. There was undoubtedly a risk of drowning for inexperienced, incompetent or drunken swimmers in the deeper parts of the mere or in patches of weed when they were out of their depth although no lives had actually been lost. But there was no evidence of any incident where anyone before the claimant had broken his neck by plunging from a standing position and striking his head on the smooth sandy bottom on which he was standing. Indeed, at the trial it was not his case that this was what had happened; he had alleged that there must have been some obstruction. There had been some evidence of two other incidents where someone suffered a minor injury (a cut or a graze) to their head whilst diving but there was no evidence that these two incidents were in any way comparable with that involving the claimant. It is then necessary to put these few incidents in context. The park had been open to the public since about 1982. Some 160,000 people used to visit the park in a year. Up to 200 would be bathing in the mere on a fine summer's day. Yet the number of incidents involving the mere were so few. It is a fallacy to say that because drowning is a serious matter that there is therefore a serious risk of drowning. In truth the risk of a drowning was very low indeed and there had never actually been one and the accident suffered by the claimant was unique. Whilst broken necks can result from incautious or reckless diving, the probability of one being suffered in the circumstances of the claimant were so remote that the risk was minimal. The internal reports before his accident make the common but elementary error of confusing the seriousness of the outcome with the degree of risk that it will occur.

80. The third point is that this confusion leads to the erroneous conclusion that there was a significant risk of injury presented to the claimant when he went into the shallow water on the day in question. One cannot say that there was no risk of injury because we know now what happened. But, in my view, it was objectively so small a risk as not to trigger s.1(1) of the 1984 Act, otherwise every injury would suffice because it must imply the existence of some risk. However, and probably more importantly, the degree of risk is central to the assessment of what reasonably should be expected of the occupier and what would be a reasonable response to the existence of that degree of risk. The response should be appropriate and proportionate to both the degree of risk and the seriousness of the outcome at risk. If the risk of serious injury is so slight and remote that it is highly unlikely ever to materialise, it may well be that it is not reasonable to expect the occupier to take any steps to protect anyone against it. The law does not require disproportionate or unreasonable responses.

81. The fourth point, one to which I know that your Lordships attach importance, is the fact that it is not, and should never be, the policy of the law to require the protection of the foolhardy or reckless few to deprive, or interfere with, the enjoyment by the remainder of society of the liberties and amenities to which they are rightly entitled. Does the law require that all trees be cut down because some youths may climb them and fall? Does the law require the coast line and other beauty spots to be lined with warning notices? Does the law require that attractive water side picnic spots be destroyed because of a few foolhardy individuals who choose to ignore warning notices and indulge in activities dangerous only to themselves? The answer to all these questions is, of course, no. But this is the road down which your Lordships, like other courts before, have been invited to travel and which the councils in the present case found so inviting. In truth, the arguments for the claimant have involved an attack upon the liberties of the citizen which should not be countenanced. They attack the liberty of the individual to engage in dangerous, but otherwise harmless, pastimes at his own risk and the liberty of citizens as a whole fully to enjoy the variety and quality of the landscape of this country. The pursuit of an unrestrained culture of blame and compensation has many evil consequences and one is certainly the interference with the liberty of the citizen. The discussion of social utility in the Illinois Supreme Court is to the same effect: Bucheleres v Chicago Park District 171 Ill 2d 435, at 457-8.

82. I cannot leave this case without expressing my complete agreement with the reasoning of the judgment of Lord Phillips, the Master of the Rolls, in Donoghue v Folkestone Properties [2003] 2 WLR 1138.

83. For these reasons and those given by my noble and learned friend Lord Hoffmann, and in agreement with the judgment of Longmore LJ, I too would allow this appeal.

LORD SCOTT OF FOSCOTE

My Lords,

84. I have had the advantage of reading in draft the opinion of my noble and learned friend Lord Hoffmann. Subject to one reservation I am in complete agreement with the reasons he gives for allowing this appeal. But I find myself in such fundamental disagreement with the approach to this case by the majority in the Court of Appeal that I want to add, also, a few comments of my own.

85. My reservation is that the Act which must be applied to the facts of this case in order to decide whether the Council is under any liability to Mr Tomlinson is, in my opinion, the Occupiers' Liability Act 1957, not the 1984 Act.

86. The 1957 Act regulates the duty of care which an occupier of premises owes to visitors to the premises (section 1(1)). "Visitors" are persons who would, at common law, be invitees or licensees (section 1(2)). The 1984 Act, on the other hand, applies to persons on the premises who are not visitors but are trespassers. It lays down the criteria for deciding whether the occupier of the premises owes any duty of care at all to the trespasser in question in relation to the type of injury he has suffered (section 1(3)). If a duty of care is owed, the Act describes the duty (section 1(4)).

87. Mr Tomlinson's case against the Council is based on an alleged breach of the duty of care they owed him. There is no doubt at all that he was a visitor at the Park. The Park was open to the public and he was entitled to be there. Wearing the shoes of a visitor, he was owed the duty of care prescribed by the 1957 Act.

88. The notices prominently displayed at various places in the Park forbade swimming in the lake. But entry into the water was not forbidden. Visitors to the Park were entitled to paddle and splash in the shallows of the lake. Many did so, particularly children. They were entitled to run into the water and splash one another. They were entitled to lie in the shallows and let the cool water lap over them. In doing these things they were visitors and were owed the 1957 Act duty of care. All they were forbidden to do was to swim. If they had started swimming, using the lake for a purpose which was forbidden, they would have lost their status as visitors and become trespassers. The 1984 Act would then have applied.

89. Mr Tomlinson did not suffer his tragic accident while swimming in the lake. He ran into the water and, when the depth of the water was at mid thigh level, executed the disastrous "dive" and suffered the accident. At no stage did he swim. It may be that his "dive" was preparatory to swimming. But swimming in water not much above knee level, say 2 feet 6 inches deep, is difficult. There might be some element of flotation but I do not think the activity would normally justify the use of the verb "swim". In any event, Mr Tomlinson's injury was not caused while he was swimming and cannot be attributed in any way to the dangers of swimming. His complaint against the Council is that the Council did not take reasonable care to discourage him while in the shallows of the lake from executing a "dive". If the "dive" was, which I regard as doubtful for the reasons given, a preliminary to an attempt to swim, the complaint may be regarded as a complaint that the Council failed to prevent him from becoming a trespasser. But this must necessarily, in my view, have been a duty owed to him while he was a visitor.

90. An analogous situation might arise in relation to the trees in the Park. Suppose there were notices forbidding the climbing of trees. Nonetheless a visitor to the Park climbs a tree, falls from it, injures himself and sues the Council. He would have been a trespasser vis-à-vis the tree. But a claim under the 1984 Act would be hopeless. The proposition that the Council owed him a duty to make the tree easier or safer to climb would be ridiculous. But the injured climber might contend that the presence of the tree posed an enticing, exciting and irresistible challenge to those visitors to the Park who, like himself, were addicted to the adrenalin surge caused by climbing high trees and that, consequently, the Council owed a duty to make it impossible for him, and others like him, to succumb to the temptation, to prevent him from becoming a trespasser vis-à-vis the tree. This duty, if it were owed at all, would be a duty owed to him, a visitor, under the 1957 Act. The contention would, of course, be rejected. The Council's 1957 Act duty of care to its visitors would not require the trees to be cut down or the trunks and lower branches to be festooned with barbed wire in order to prevent visitors to the Park from disobeying the notices and turning themselves into trespassers by climbing the trees. For present purposes, however, the point I want to make is that the climber's contention would engage the 1957 Act, not the 1984 Act.

91. In the present case it seems to me unreal to regard Mr Tomlinson's injury as having been caused while he was a trespasser. His complaint, rejected by the trial judge but accepted by the majority in the Court of Appeal, was that the Council ought to have taken effective steps to discourage entry by visitors into the waters of the lake. The notices were held to be inadequate discouragement. But, if there was this duty, it was a duty owed to visitors. The people who read the notices, or who could have read them but failed to do so, would have been visitors. These were the people to be discouraged. The alleged duty was a 1957 Act duty.

92. The Council's duty under the 1957 Act to its visitors was a duty "to take such care as in all the circumstances of the case is reasonable to see that the visitor will be reasonably safe in using the premises for the purposes for which he is invited or permitted .... to be there" (section 2(2)). The purpose for which visitors were invited or permitted to be in the Park was general recreation. This included paddling and playing about in the water. The proposition that in order to discharge their 1957 Act duty to visitors the Council had to discourage them from any entry into the water and, in effect, to prevent the paddling and playing about that so many had for so long enjoyed is, in my opinion, for the reasons so cogently expressed by Lord Hoffmann, wholly unacceptable. There was no breach by the Council of its 1957 Act duty. The question whether it owed any 1984 Act duty did not, in my opinion, arise. If, wrongly in my opinion, the 1984 Act were to be regarded as applicable, the case would be a fortiori.

93. There are two respects, in my opinion, in which the approach of the courts below to the facts of this case have been somewhat unreal. First, the action of Mr Tomlinson that brought about his tragic injury has been described as a "dive". I think it is misdescribed. A dive into water, as normally understood, involves a hands-arms-head-first movement from a standpoint above the water down into the water. A dive is dangerous if the depth of the water is unknown for the obvious reason that if the depth is inadequate the head may strike the bottom of the pool or the lake before the diver is able to check his downwards trajectory and curve out of the dive. There had, apparently, been two previous occasions over the past five years or so on which a person diving into the lake had suffered head injuries. The evidence did not disclose the details but it seems reasonable to assume that these occasions had involved dives properly so-called. Mr Tomlinson did not execute a dive in the ordinary sense. He ran into the lake and, when he thought he was far enough in to do so, he threw himself forward. His forward plunge may, for want of a better word, be called a "dive" but it should not be confused with the normal and usual dive. Mr Tomlinson was not diving from a standpoint above the lake down into water of uncertain depth. His feet were on the bottom of the lake immediately before he executed his forward plunge. He knew how deep the water was when he began the plunge. He must have expected the downward shelving of the bottom of the lake to continue and there is no evidence that it did not. The accident happened because the trajectory of his forward plunge was not sufficiently shallow. This was not a diving accident in the ordinary sense and there was no evidence that an accident caused in the manner in which Mr Tomlinson's was caused had ever previously occurred at the lake.

94. Second, much was made of the trial judge's finding that the dangers of diving or swimming in the lake were obvious, at least to adults. No one has contested that finding of fact. But I think its importance has been overstated. Mr Tomlinson was not diving in the normal sense, nor was he swimming. He simply ran into the water and when he could not run any further, because the water was above his knees and the galloping action that we all adopt when running into water on a shelving beach had become too difficult, he plunged forward. This is something that happens on every beach in every country in the world, temperature and conditions permitting. Mr Tomlinson would not have stopped to think about the dangers of swimming or diving in the lake. He was not taking a pre-meditated risk. It would not have occurred to him, if he had thought about it, that he was taking a risk at all. He was a high spirited young man enjoying himself with his friends in a pleasant Park with a pleasant water facility. If he had set out to swim across the lake, it might have been relevant to speak of his taking an obvious risk. If he had climbed a tree with branches overhanging the lake and had dived from a branch into the water he would have been courting an obvious danger. But he was not doing any such thing. He was simply sporting about in the water with his friends, giving free rein to his exuberance. And why not? And why should the Council be discouraged by the law of tort from providing facilities for young men and young women to enjoy themselves in this way? Of course there is some risk of accidents arising out of the joie de vivre of the young. But that is no reason for imposing a grey and dull safety regime on everyone. This appeal must be allowed.

Risk and the State
Prime Minister Tony Blair
Institute of Public Policy Research
May 26, 2005

In eight years as Prime Minister, I don't know that you accumulate much wisdom, but you certainly accumulate experience. I want to talk today about a particular problem my experience has led me to identify. It is an issue that seems more of a talking point than an issue of policy; that has many different facets to it; that is little discussed in the way I'm about to discuss it; but which, on the basis of my experience, if it goes wrong, has the capacity to do serious damage to our country.

It is what I call a sensible debate about risk in public policy making. In my view, we are in danger of having a wholly disproportionate attitude to the risks we should expect to run as a normal part of life. This is putting pressure on policy-making, not just in Government but in regulatory bodies, on local government, public services, in Europe and across parts of the private sector - to act to eliminate risk in a way that is out of all proportion to the potential damage. The result is a plethora of rules, guidelines, responses to 'scandals' of one nature or another that ends up having utterly perverse consequences.

First of all, let my argument itself not lose its sense of balance.

Health and safety legislation is necessary to protect people at work. Food standards are necessary to protect people from harm. Protections are necessary for children from the danger of predatory adults. These are things against which, historically, the state has underwritten the risk. The pooling of such risks is still the fundamental basis of our case for publicly funded public services.

Workplace fatalities have fallen by around two-thirds since the 1970s. Higher environmental standards have helped deliver cleaner air and water. Since 1990 sulphur dioxide emissions have fallen by 75% and water pollution fell by 65% in the 5 years to 2001.

And not every new regulation has the detrimental consequences that are claimed for it. The National Minimum Wage did not lead to millions of job losses, as some had predicted but helped over 1 million low paid workers. In fact, Britain compares favourably with its competitors on regulation. As the OECD and the IMF have recently said, the UK is very lightly regulated by international standards.

But something is seriously awry when teachers feel unable to take children on school trips, for fear of being sued; when the Financial Services Authority that was established to provide clear guidelines and rules for the financial services sector and to protect the consumer against the fraudulent, is seen as hugely inhibiting of efficient business by perfectly respectable companies that have never defrauded anyone; when pensions protection inflates dramatically the cost of selling pensions to middle-income people; where health and safety rules across a range of areas is taken to extremes. Europe has done itself more damage through what is perceived as unnecessary interference than all the pamphlets by Eurosceptics could ever do.

The development of new science adds a different dimension to the problem.

'Science' is often taken to be a synonym for 'certainty'. So, when a scientist admits to uncertainty it can often be taken as an admission that there is probably a problem. In fact, in the scientific world ambiguity, uncertainty, the wisdom that comes with failing and changing your mind, are all essential to progress. Often there is no obvious right or wrong answer. The most likely outcome changes all the time, in response to new evidence.

This is a major challenge both to politicians and the media. The structure of political combat tends to invite certainty, or at least a show of certainty, when that idiom is entirely inappropriate for discussing fine-grained risks and the balance of probability. There are trade-offs, dilemmas, balances between costs and benefits in every decision. Unless we find a viable way of discussing these risks a mature national conversation on important policy questions like GM science will be impossible.

So, for example, one piece of research into a supposed link between autism and the MMR single jab, starts a scare that, despite the vast weight of evidence to the contrary, makes people believe a method of vaccination used the world over, is unsafe. The result is an increase in risk to our children's health under the very guise of limiting that risk.

And before we all just complain about the regulators, the public servants or indeed the Government, let us just pause for a moment in sympathy. A civil servant or regulator who fails to regulate a risk that materialises will be castigated. How many are rewarded when they refuse to regulate and take the risk?

Bodies set up to guard the public interest have one-way pressures. It is in their interest never to be accused of having missed a problem. So, it is a one-sided bet. They will always err on the side of caution.

It seems to be part of the DNA of regulatory bodies that they acquire their own interests and begin to grow. Max Weber famously noted the tendency of bureaucracies to tidiness.

Today, a lot of this is reinforced by what arises from Europe. About 50% of regulations with a significant impact on business now emanate from the EU. And it often seems to want to regulate too heavily without sufficient cause. The EU vitamins directive is a good example. There may be a case for ensuring the public are properly informed and that some rules and order are brought to what is today a major industry. But the way it has been done is wholly out of proportion to the risks run.

Then there are the legal claims. People are entitled to sue. And often the most outlandish cases that are brought are dismissed. But their headlines live on, create a myth and the myth is acted upon.

Here in Britain, whatever the actual state of the so-called compensation culture, the perception of it and the effects of that perception are real. In England in 2003 there were between 7 and 10 million pupil visits on school trips. Sadly, there was one fatality. But only one.

Between 2000 and 2005 the overall number of accident claims fell by 5.3%. Over the same period, accident claims against local authorities, schools, volunteering organisations and other public sector bodies fell by 7.5%. In 2000, the cost of litigation in the UK as a percentage of GDP was less than a third of that in the US. Tort costs in the UK in 2000 were 0.6% of GDP. This is the lowest of any developed nation except Denmark.

But the facts too often do not prevail. You may recall the stories of the girl who sued the Girl Guides Association because she burnt her leg on a sausage or the man who was injured when he failed to apply the brake on a toboggan run in an amusement park.

Neither of these cases produced big compensation awards in the courts. But this is not the impression that is left. The headlines have an after-life. They leave behind the sense that, not only are such cases being brought all the time, but that huge sums of money are being wasted.

This impression, in turn, has genuine effects. Public bodies, in fear of litigation, act in highly risk-averse and peculiar ways. We have had a local authority removing hanging baskets for fear that they might fall on someone's head, even though no such accident had occurred in the 18 years they had been hanging there. A village in the Cotswolds was required to pull up a seesaw because it was judged a danger under an EU Directive on Playground Equipment for Outside Use. This was despite the fact that no accidents had occurred on it.

And in case we think we alone are subject to this, countless examples can be found even in the most 'open market' economies. The response of the US Congress to the Enron and Worldcom scandals shows what governments can do wrong. In 2002 the Sarbanes-Oxley Act was, in the words of The Economist, 'designed in a panic and rushed through in a blinding fervour of moral indignation'.

The point about Sarbanes-Oxley was not that the underlying problems it was addressing were not real. It was quite right to put some distance between a company's auditors and its managers, between whom a severe conflict of interest had arisen. The problem was that the Act was not limited to the remedy of that specific defect.

Inspired by the need for Congress to be seen to do something dramatic, Sarbanes-Oxley has imposed the threat of criminal penalties on managers and substantial new costs on American business: an average of $2.4m extra for auditing for each company. The burden is especially heavy on smaller companies, the real risk-takers in the market. Firms with a revenue of less than $100m per annum now pay out more than 2.5% of turnover in compliance costs. Cumulatively the costs run into billions of dollars.

There is a delicious irony in this which illustrates the unintended consequences of regulation. Sarbanes-Oxley has provided a bonanza for accountants and auditors, the very professions thought to be at fault in the original scandals.

Behind all of this, the big examples and the small, there is something new here. The pace of change in the world can be bewildering and breeds insecurity. Recent advances in science - from the human genome project to the work on cloning - seem to come along at a rate and on a scale unknown to previous generations. Business is more globally competitive than it has ever been. With these new opportunities come new risks, new dilemmas.

A natural but wrong response is to retreat in the face of this change. To regulate to eliminate risk. To restrict rather than enable. But we pay a price if we react like this. We lose out in business to India and China, who are prepared to accept the risks. We are unable to exploit our scientific discoveries. We seek protection from risks that are exaggerated or even imagined. We allow the conspiracy theorists to dictate the argument without a basis in fact.

Likewise in more mundane areas of public service the idea that it is the job of Government to elimitate risk can lead to the elimination of common sense. In her book The Moral State We're In, Julia Neuberger claims that, if an old person falls on the floor, the regulations currently decree that the care worker cannot help them to their feet. They have to go and find some hoists before they can help. No doubt, most care-workers help anyway but if basic human acts of care like this are being prevented by intrusive regulation, it is absurd. We cannot guarantee a risk-free life.

So what to do? First, recognise the problem. Some public discussion of it helps engender a more sensible debate. Instead of the 'something must be done' cry that goes up every time there is a problem or a 'scandal', we make it clear we will reflect first and regulate only after reflection. Second, start to roll back the tide of regulation in specific areas: here, in Europe, in respect of the regulatory bodies themselves. Third, replace the compensation culture with a common sense culture.

Fourth, start a proper, serious debate with the media about how some of these issues are addressed and how the public is better informed.

Here are the practical steps we will take as a Government.

Better regulation will be a central theme of the UK Presidency of the EU later this year. The Commission has produced an action plan on better regulation which includes commitments to impact assessments for all new measures in 2005. These assessments enable us to have a proper debate about the costs and benefits of proposed measures. For example, we have so far reduced the costs of the proposed Chemicals Directive by £6bn and we want to go further. We will also continue to resist attempts to remove the opt-out from the Working Time Directive. We are taking this work forward in the context of the Presidency initiative with Holland, Ireland, Luxembourg, Austria and Finland to deliver better regulation in Europe.

When we assume the Presidency of the EU next month, we want to go further. Our priorities for the Presidency will include:

- Working to ensure that comprehensive impact assessments are undertaken for all new EU legislation
- Further proposals for the simplification of EU regulations
- Improving the consultation process in Europe to ensure there is an effective dialogue with business and other interested parties. This will be the theme of a major conference we are hosting in Edinburgh in September.
- Consulting on applying a risk-based approach to the UK's implementation of the financial services action plan.

Domestically, we are tackling gold-plating and over-zealous enforcement. We recently published revised guidelines for the transposition of European legislation into UK law to ensure that the UK implements EU laws in the clearest and least burdensome way possible. This guidance establishes the principle that transposed UK laws should mirror, as closely as possible, the wording of the original EU directive. It also puts in place more checks and balances against over-implementation.

We are also committed to putting into effect the recent Hampton and Arculus reviews of regulation. As the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced this week, when he launched the Better Regulation Action Plan, risk is the governing concept in all the changes we will introduce to reduce regulatory burdens on business. We will implement the reforms recommended by the Hampton Review, such as fewer regulatory bodies and risk-based enforcement by local authorities.

In July 2005 we will begin consultation on the Better Regulation Bill which will contain statutory requirements for regulators to use a rigorous risk-based approach and powers to reform penalties acccording to risk-based principles.

We will also implement the recommendations made by the Better Regulation Task Force to reduce administrative burdens and toughen up the scrutiny of new measures by using the principle of "one in-one out". There is a clue in the name - this principle means simply that we need to look for a regulation to be removed when new measures are introduced.

We are also acting to ensure that public sector entrepreneurs are not discouraged by unecessary interference. Inspection has been an important part of the way we have improved standards in public services but inspection needs to evolve to reflect that success. Crucially, modern inspection, as David Bell of OFSTED has been arguing, needs to be proportionate to the risks faced. We announced in the Budget that we will create four new inspectorates to replace the current eleven. The new inspectorates will be actively charged with ensuring those doing well get a light touch approach.

The new Compensation Bill will do two things. It will limit the work of claims management companies or "claims farmers". Claims farmers capture claims and typically sell them on to solicitors, sometimes having already signed the consumer up for a package of insurance. Many claims farmers indulge in high-pressure selling and aggressive marketing including approaching vulnerable people in public places, such as hospitals. Many consumers have been misled into making claims where their cases are weak.

The Bill will also clarify the existing common law on negligence to make clear that there is no liability in negligence for untoward incidents that could not be avoided by taking reasonable care or exercising reasonable skill. Simple guidelines should be issued. Compliance should avoid legal action. This will send a strong signal and it will also reduce risk-averse behaviour by providing reassurance to those who may be concerned about possible litigation, such as volunteers, teachers and local authorities.

We can also act to ensure that, when valid cases are brought, they are settled quickly. The big lesson from public consultations is that what the public frequently demand is not direct personal compensation. They want to know that, where something has gone wrong, lessons have been learnt and that the same mistake won't be made in the future to someone else. So, wherever possible, we want claims settled informally and quickly, without going to court.

The NHS Redress Bill will give quicker redress to patients earlier in the process for low monetary value clinical negligence cases. The Bill will allow for compensation but it will offer a real alternative to litigation and avoid the delays and costs that are part of the current system. It will ensure greater consistency in the way claims are dealt with across the NHS.

These are sensible, practical, proposals for specific defects in the system. But we cannot pretend that by itself legislation is the answer.

We also need a far more rational, balanced and intelligent debate as to how 'risk' is debated. Not every 'scandal' requires a regulatory response. Bad people will find a way round the law no matter how good the law is. Spending hundreds of millions of pounds to reduce the risk to zero may be a foolish way of prioritising expenditure.

We struggle with the aftermath of BSE - incidentally spending still hundreds of millions of pounds on the OTMS. We nearly got Sudan B completely out of proportion.

And as science becomes ever more far-reaching, it is time to have a proper dialogue about how science and its risks are evaluated and reported. Bio-technology is probably the coming industry of the world. Britain and Europe should be world leaders. We are in grave danger of blowing our chance. If we do, we will rue it bitterly. We need calm, considered debate about technology, science and risk. Government has a clear responsibility here: to be open, to provide the evidence we have, not to overclaim.

DOJ_NMG_0142813

The media have a responsibility. MMR is one example. The present debate on mobile phones is another. We only narrowly avoided massive expenditure on SARS.

We need to involve the media in a better dialogue about risk. To that end, I have asked John Hutton to invite newspaper and broadcast editors to discuss with the Chief Medical Officer and the Government's Chief Scientist the best and most appropriate forum for ensuring that risk is communicated effectively so that the maximum information can be put into the public domain with the minimum of unnecessary alarm.

We need to involve the public more directly. In our manifesto we made a commitment to explore innovative ways of engaging with the public, particularly on matters of scientific uncertainty. There are already some good examples of public consultation which will improve the quality of decision making and increase the public appreciation of the risks involved.

- The National Institute for Clinical Excellence (NICE) has established a Citizens' Council to discuss the value judgements that underlie medical decisions.
- The Environment Agency has on-going public discussions about flood risk and coastal defences
- The new Genetics Knowledge Parks have been charged with engaging the public properly in discussions about the benefits of their research.

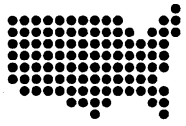
We should understand the nature of the decisions we take together, have a mature, reasoned debate between government, experts and people; a conversation between adults taking responsibility for the risks they face.

So: there needs to be a proper and proportionate way of assessing risk and the response to it. Government cannot eliminate all risk. A risk-averse scientific community is no scientific community at all. A risk-averse business culture is no business culture at all. A risk-averse public sector will stifle creativity and deny to many the opportunities to be creative while supplying a few with compensation payments.

There is usually a seductive logic to any new regulation. There is almost always a case that can be made for each specific instrument. The problem is cumulative. All these good intentions can add up to a large expense, with suffocating effects.

Sometimes, we need to pause for a moment and think whether we will not do more damage with a hasty response than was done by the problem itself. We cannot respond to every accident by trying to guarantee ever more tiny margins of safety. We cannot eliminate risk. We have to live with it, manage it.

Sometimes we have to accept: no-one is to blame.



Such an approach is easy to state; hard to do.

But at least if we start to debate the problem, there is a chance we can begin addressing it.

The Modern Transformation of Civil Law

George L. Priest*

This paper addresses the transformation of civil law that began in this country roughly around the mid-1960s changing a legal system that intervened in the lives of citizens only on occasions of serious moral dereliction into the most extensive and powerful regulatory mechanism of modern society. Prior to the 1960s, civil law served a modest role in U.S. affairs. It enforced property rights and policed boundary disputes through property law, enforced promises as well as disclaimers of liability through contract law, and provided damages for personal injury through negligence law (tort law) where an individual was injured by an egregious breach of standards of normal behavior. Though the negligence standard proved loose enough to allow substantial subsequent expansion, prior to the 1960s courts employed that standard only where a party had shown clear moral culpability substantially antagonistic to social norms. Standards determined by private contract were far more significant with respect to the determination of the obligations of citizens.

Since the 1960s, however, our civil law has changed dramatically. Contract law, property law, and especially personal injury law have been transformed both in function and effect. The transformation occurred neither through some sudden change in legal doctrine nor through legislative statute or popular referendum. Instead, it occurred through the triumph of a set of ideas: the acceptance by the judiciary of the proposition that civil damage judgments can serve as the most effective public policy instrument for regulating the level of harm suffered by citizens in the society.

* John M. Olin Professor of Law and Economics, Yale Law School. I have studied this subject for many years. See generally, Priest, The Invention of Enterprise Liability: A Critical History of the Intellectual Foundations of Modern Tort Law, 14 J. Legal Studies 461 (1985); Priest, Strict Products Liability: The Original Intent, 10 Cardozo L. Rev. 2301 (1989); Priest, The New Legal Structure of Risk Control, 119 Daedalus 207 (1990); Priest, The Culture of Modern Tort Law, 34 Valparaiso L. Rev. 573 (2000). This paper draws variously from this work.

It is surely not coincidental that the outset of the transformation of civil law was roughly contemporaneous with the creation of various federal regulatory agencies charged with controlling levels of harm, such as the Occupational Health and Safety Administration (created in 1971), the Environmental Protection Agency (1970), the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration (1970), and the Consumer Product Safety Commission (1972). In many respects, however, the transformation of civil law developed in ways that gave it a far more ambitious and extensive regulatory authority than any of these agencies. All regulatory agencies have limited budgets and, as a consequence, are constrained to thresholds of concern. Thus, even agencies with broad authority—such as OSHA or EPA—can effectively regulate the decisions of only a limited number of corporations. Other regulatory agencies—such as NHTSA—possess jurisdiction over only a single industry (auto manufacture).

Our modern civil justice system, in contrast, aspires to regulate the sources of harm with respect to all activities of the society. Our civil courts can entertain the question of whether a victim should receive compensation from the party that caused it harm as long as it is economically worthwhile for a person feeling victimized to initiate litigation. And all of such claims will be entertained. Indeed, to perfect the system, the incentives for initiating litigation have themselves been enhanced by various statutes awarding attorneys' fees and shifting litigation costs as well as by expansive notions of "harm", for example by awarding damages for medical monitoring to individuals who only suspect or fear that they have been harmed. As a result, our courts today employ civil damage judgments to regulate all activities implicating harm, made within every industry, indeed, by every citizen. Through the daily aggregation of civil damage judgments (or the settlement of lawsuits informed by expected judgments), our courts provide fine-tuned control of all societal behavior.

How did this transformation of civil law come about?[1] In the 19th and early 20th Centuries, the basic doctrines of civil law remained generally stable. Yet, there was serious debate in the legal academy as well as in the public policy community generally over the role of civil law with respect to harms suffered in the society. An important initial step in the transformation of civil law occurred in the early years of the 20th Century when civil law was abandoned as a mechanism for dealing with injuries suffered by workers during the course of their employment. The adoption by state legislatures of worker compensation statutes during the period roughly 1907-1915—creating mandatory employer insurance programs—represented the rejection of both tort law and contract law as means of regulating the sources of worker injuries.

Prior to the establishment of workers' compensation insurance, injured workers could seek recovery against their employers in tort law where they could show employer negligence as a cause of the injury. Employers could defend such claims, however, by showing that the worker had been contributorily negligent, that the worker had assumed the risk of injury, or that the worker's injury resulted from the negligence of a fellow worker, according to what is called the fellow-servant doctrine. Workers could sue their fellow workers for negligence, but recovery was not likely to be substantial given workers' limited resources. Thus, it became widely accepted that tort law was largely ineffective in providing recovery to injured workers, and tort law was rejected as a mechanism for recovery. In its place, workers' compensation statutes compelled employers to provide insurance for worker injuries and, at the same time, prohibited workers from suing employers in tort.

Though somewhat less sharply, workers' compensation insurance also represented a rejection of contract law as a mechanism for dealing with injuries. Few believed that workers, individually, were able to negotiate safer working conditions, and only a small portion of the working class was unionized. In addition, the concept of compensating wage differentials was not widely understood. Contract law, therefore, was not an answer. To the contrary, employer-provided insurance was necessary if workers were to receive compensation for injuries.

Besides serving the ambition of increasing payments to injured workers, workers' compensation insurance came to be justified by a concept that derived from economics: the concept of internalizing costs.[2] According to this concept, if a party engaging in some activity fails to take into account the full costs that the activity generates, the party is likely to engage in more of the activity than is appropriate for the society. Where the costs are injury costs, there will result higher levels of injurious activities and thus larger numbers of injuries than societally appropriate. If injury costs are internalized, however, the party causing the harm will be led to prevent losses where possible and otherwise to readjust its activity level to reduce the aggregate number of injuries. Compelling employers to provide insurance for all injuries suffered by workers during the course of employment serves to internalize the costs of worker injuries to employers.[3]

The adoption of workers' compensation programs was widely praised in the legal academy. Indeed, some academics thought the concept so meritorious that they sought to extend such insurance programs more broadly, to provide compensation for all injuries suffered in the society. Fleming James was a prominent promoter of this idea.[4] The ambition of James and others to have enacted general societal accident insurance, however, never found success. First, a general social insurance program is a program, basically, of socialism, to which there was deep political opposition. (Note that even during the New Deal, insurance programs were established only with respect to particular risks—such as crop insurance, savings and loan insurance, and Social Security.[5]) Secondly, general social insurance is at heart inconsistent with the internalizing costs rationale. General social insurance is not self-contained as is insurance for workplace injuries. To provide general insurance for injuries does not serve to internalize costs to the specific activities that generated the injuries. General social insurance would provide compensation to injured parties—sufficient grounds for support to James and others—but it would not serve to create incentives for reducing the accident rate.

[3] By contrast, failing to compensate workers for their injuries, say, by enforcement of the common law tort defenses of contributory negligence, assumption of risk or the fellow-servant doctrine, serves to internalize worker injury costs to the workers themselves. Many years later, Ronald Coase would show that, with respect to activity levels, internalizing injury costs to workers will have economic effects equivalent to internalizing those costs to employers. This profound idea, however, remains foreign to the debate today. Ronald H. Coase, The Problem of Social Cost, 3 J. Law & Economics 1 (1960).

Faced with the failure of their social insurance proposals and with no serious prospect of future success, many academics pressed for the expansion of civil law as a means of providing broader compensation to injured parties. James, again, was the most prominent toward this end. In a set of roughly fifty articles, James urged the expansion of tort liability in all of its forms and the restriction of available defenses, moving toward a standard of absolute liability.

For many years, James' advocacy had little effect. An opening wedge appeared, however, in the early 1960s with regard to the subject of manufacturer liability. Until the 1960s, recovery for injuries resulting from product use was chiefly determined by contract law. Contract law allowed the specific purchaser of the product to recover according to the terms of the express product warranty or of the implied warranty of merchantability. Recovery was available to the specific purchaser and, generally, only to the specific purchaser, because that person was the only party to the contract of sale (a legal doctrine known as privity of contract). Virtually all product warranties at the time, however, disclaimed liability for any personal injury associated with use of the product.[6] Thus, according to contract law and the terms of product contracts, there was no recovery for personal injury.

[5] Franklin Roosevelt justified Social Security as providing protection for the "risk of old age".

[6] The central warranty remedy then (as now) was repair and replacement if a product were found to be defective. There are good economic reasons for manufacturers to disclaim liability for personal injury—

There had been some concern about the operation of these contract doctrines prior to the 1960s, but it remained chiefly academic. Some few jurisdictions recognized an action in negligence by a victim not a party to the contract. MacPherson v. Buick[7] was decided in 1916, but it extended negligence liability only to manufacturers of products regarded as "imminently dangerous", and only where it could be shown that the purchaser or an intermediate dealer would not inspect the product for defects. Over the four decades that followed MacPherson, some jurisdictions extended the scope of the negligence doctrine, in particular to cases involving spoiled foodstuffs, although the jurisdictions were far from unanimous. Thus, through the late 1950s and early 1960s, defective product cases were controlled by contract law with its privity requirement and, to a substantially lesser extent, by negligence law.

This was to change, however, and change dramatically in the early 1960s and 1970s first in the then-limited field of product liability. In my judgment, there were two conceptual forces leading to this change. The first was the delegitimation of contract law—in particular, warranty law—as a means for dealing with product injuries. The second was the growing belief that the expansion of tort liability in the context of personal injuries could have beneficial effects on the society.

The delegitimation of contract law followed from the work of another law professor, Friedrich Kessler.[8] Kessler was a German scholar who had fled the Hitler regime to the United States. Kessler had no specific interest in product-related injuries. His attack on contract law was far more expansive. Kessler believed that fundamental changes had occurred in the character of Western economies that deeply threatened democratic societies and the individual freedoms that had been achieved in modern times. Kessler attributed these social changes to the "decline of the free market system,"[9] which he saw as a consequence of "the innate trend of competitive capitalism toward monopoly."[10] Kessler's criticism of the capitalistic world was quite pointed. He described the modern industrial culture as a form of fascism. "The rise of fascism in our industrial world has made us realize that democratic freedom is not inevitable."[11] According to Kessler, single firms are now able "to control and regulate the distribution of goods from producer all the way down to the ultimate consumer."[12]

Quite curiously, Kessler saw the principal mechanism for this new means of fascist control to be contract law. The formation of "large industrial empires" had been made possible by contract and by standardized contracts in particular.[13] Standardized contracts—such as insurance policies or consumer product warranties—were the equivalent of the forms of bondage typical of the feudal era. According to Kessler, "[s]tandard contracts . . . [have] become effective instruments in the hands of powerful industrial and commercial overlords enabling them to impose a new feudal order of their own making upon a vast host of vassals."[14]

Kessler's most influential article with respect to the transformation of modern civil law is the classic "Contracts of Adhesion—Some Thoughts about Freedom of Contract". The article presents a moral narrative that contrasts the ancient to the modern, the good to the evil, the redeemable to the unredeemable that possesses a persuasive power that continues to command acceptance today. Kessler contrasts a "society of small enterprisers, individual merchants and independent craftsmen" for whom 19th Century contract law was designed, with large-scale enterprise and monopoly capitalism characteristic of modern times. Freedom of contract may have had meaning in the earlier world. Today, however, the prototypical modern contract is a standardized form employed by enterprises with strong bargaining power against weaker parties—consumers—in need of necessary goods and services. Modern contracts are contracts of adhesion that consumers must take or leave without ever understanding their terms at all. In this context, the enforcement of contract terms according to the principle of freedom of contract serves only to protect "the unequal distribution of property."[15]

The second principal conceptual force toward the transformation of civil law was the insistence by James and others that an expansion of tort liability would substantially improve social welfare. James, as mentioned, was principally concerned with providing compensation to injured parties. He supported general social insurance and, in its absence, the expansion of tort liability to achieve that end. His ambition was valuably aided, however, by judicial opinions that focused more sharply on the positive societal gains from expanded tort liability.

Judicial acceptance of the broader role of tort law toward these ends first appeared in 1944 in California Supreme Court Justice Roger Traynor's concurring opinion in Escola v. Coca Cola Bottling Co.[16] Traynor's opinion sets forth the grounds for the strict liability standard for product defects that later was adopted by the California Supreme Court and virtually all other states. The case was simple. A waitress at a restaurant was moving some bottles of soda pop when one of them exploded, injuring her. (The context of the incident was never made clear. The California Supreme Court, and Traynor, approached the issue as if the bottle exploded spontaneously. Whether the waitress dropped the bottle, hit the bottle against something, or stumbled and fell was not present before the Court.) The majority of the California Supreme Court also found the case simple: they invoked the tort doctrine of res ipsa loquitur (roughly, the event speaks for itself) to hold that, despite the terms of any contractual arrangement between the distributor and the restaurant (in fact, the Court did not even discuss the contractual arrangement), the manufacturer should be liable because Coke bottles should not explode.

Justice Traynor's concurrence was more subtle and more policy oriented. He concurred with the Court's finding of liability, but provided deeper grounds for the appropriateness of shifting the costs of the waitress's injury to Coca-Cola. Traynor embraced a theory of strict liability in tort of the manufacturer. Strict liability was to be distinguished from negligence liability—in which the victim has to show that the defendant committed some negligent act. Traynor analogized the strict liability standard to the standard of res ipsa loquitor: if there is something defective with respect to the product, the manufacturer is to blame. That analogy, however, important for many courts in the future, was not Traynor's principal point. Traynor argued that there were important social grounds to extend liability to manufacturers for product-related injuries. First, such liability would lead manufacturers to invest to prevent product-related injuries in the future. Second, tort liability, resulting in the payment of compensatory damages to injured consumers, would provide a form of insurance to the injured that could be passed along in the product prices paid by all consumers. The expansion of tort liability, thus, would—like workers' compensation insurance—serve to internalize injury costs to the firms that generated them. In 1944, however, Traynor's concurrence was only a concurrence, and received little notice, though that would later change.

These ideas—contract law is perverted by market power, and tort law is a means of encouraging investments in accident prevention and insurance for resulting losses—transformed modern civil law. The first applications, again, were in the products liability field. In 1960, in the case Henningsen v. Bloomfield Motors, Inc., the New Jersey Supreme Court marked the effective end of the relevance of contract law in defective product actions involving personal injury.[17] The decision repudiates the basic principles of contract law applicable to product defect cases. Henningsen involved an action brought by the wife of the purchaser of a car, injured when the car veered off the road without an adequate explanation, though there was testimony suggesting a mechanical defect. Even putting aside the privity of contract problem, the automobile manufacturer's warranty provided only for repair or replacement of any defective part and disclaimed implied warranties that might extend liability further, including to personal injury damages. The New Jersey Supreme Court held that the privity doctrine as well as the express disclaimer of implied warranties were invalid as a matter of law—quoting from and relying heavily on Kessler's "Contracts of Adhesion". According to the Court, contract law should not be read to "authorize the automobile manufacturer to use its grossly disproportionate bargaining power to relieve itself from liability . . . An instinctively felt sense of justice cries out against such a sharp bargain."[18] The Court held that Mrs. Henningsen could recover under the Court's interpretation of the implied warranty of merchantabilty.

The permanent shift from contract to an expanded tort law as the basis for the resolution of product defect claims occurred in 1963 in the California Supreme Court decision in Greenman v. Yuba Power Products.[19] The case involved personal injury from an allegedly defectively designed machine tool.[20] The manufacturer-defendant believed that its strongest defense was the failure of the victim to provide notice of the alleged breach of warranty within a reasonable time. The strict notice requirement of contract law, however, had been flagged as illustrative of the outdated character of warranty law in many treatments of the product defect question, including those by James and a scholar writing in a similar vein, William Prosser. In Greenman, it seemed to trigger the final acceptance by a majority of the California Supreme Court of Traynor's strict liability argument first presented nearly two decades earlier in Escola.

In Greenman, the court, in a Traynor opinion, announced the standard of strict liability in tort, applicable to a manufacturer whenever "an article he places on the market, knowing that it is to be used without inspection for defects, proves to have a defect that causes injury to a human being." The purpose of strict liability, according to the court, "is to insure that the costs of injuries resulting from defective products are borne by the manufacturers that put such products on the market rather than by the injured persons who are powerless to protect themselves."[21] For a further elaboration of justifications of strict liability, the reader was referred to James, Prosser and Traynor's concurring opinion in Escola.

Henningsen and Greenman were important moments in the transformation of civil law. One further event, however, vastly accelerated the transformation by jurisdictions skittish of the cutting edge. In 1964, the American Law Institute adopted Section 402A of its second Restatement of Torts, which extended strict liability to sellers of all products defective and unreasonably dangerous without regard to the seller's fault. The Reporter of the Restatement, William Prosser,[22] represented to the Institute that 16 separate jurisdictions had adopted strict liability or some standard resembling it, citing 40 different cases. This was blatant exaggeration. A rereading today shows that there were only three cases actually supporting Prosser's recommendation: Henningsen, Greenman, and a 1963 New York decision, Goldberg v. Kollsman Instrument Co.[23] But Prosser's recommendation was sufficient for the Institute, and the Institute's adoption of the strict liability standard was sufficient for the various states to adopt the standard as well. Within a little more than a decade following the Institute's adoption of the strict liability standard, forty-one of fifty jurisdictions had adopted the rule.

As mentioned, the change in the legal standards regarding product liability was only an opening wedge in the more general transformation of modern civil law though, surely, a significant wedge. The broader transformation of the law resulted from the extension of the underlying ideas that had motivated the change in products liability, first, to all other areas of civil law and, second, conceptually by the acceptance of the proposition that civil law could serve as a mechanism for regulating all risks faced by the society.

First, although the strict liability standard itself has been limited to the products field, the concept of cost internalization that underlies it has been extended across the various fields of civil law. Thus, the internalization policy has been extended to justify awarding damages in pollution cases,[24] in sexual harassment cases,[25] and in false arrest, malicious prosecution and Section 1983 civil rights violation cases,[26] among others. In these various contexts, as with product manufacture, it appears evident to which party costs should be internalized: to the manufacturer rather than the consumer; similarly, to the polluter, to the party harassing the victim, and to the official committing misconduct.

The second extension of the concept involved its application to contexts in which it is less clear to which party costs should be internalized. In contexts such as these, extension of the cost internalization concept requires consideration of losses viewed as risks attending the activity in question. Thus, all losses suffered in the society represent the outcome of some probabilistic process. The actions of one party or another can be viewed as contributing to the probability of occurrence of a loss, arrayed upon a continuum from losses the probability of which is 100 percent—intentionally caused harms—to losses the probability of which is zero.

Cost internalization provides us with a mechanism for reaching the correct level of deterrence for official misconduct. If people acting under color of state law know that they will bear the consequences of their actions, they will be deterred from violating a person's federal rights, but will not be over-deterred. The 'correct' level of deterrence will be established.")

With this extension, the basic foundation of civil law is transformed into controlling risks through cost internalization. The question before the court becomes which party to the litigation is in the best position to control the risk of loss. Again, in many contexts—such as product manufacture—it may seem obvious which party is in the superior position to control risks.[27] In other contexts, however, determining which party is in the superior position to bear the risk of loss from the activity is more complicated and requires a seemingly more sophisticated analysis of the relative abilities of the parties before the court to prevent or to bear those risks.

The adoption of risk control as the central purpose of civil law shifts sharply the focus of legal controversy in each of its various subfields. In the field of contract law, for example, contract litigation only a few decades ago turned chiefly on differing interpretations in terms of standard English of the provisions of underlying written contracts. In modern contract litigation, in contrast, the issues have been completely reoriented around the question of risk. The fact that some change in underlying conditions led one of the parties to breach the contract is only the beginning of the inquiry. The issue before the court is which party should bear the risk of the change in conditions that impelled the breach. Today, courts summon sophisticated theories of economics and risk bearing to determine whether it is more consistent with the long-term interests of the parties to assign the risk of the specific change of conditions that animated the breach to the breaching party or to the victim of the breach itself.

[27] In fact, from an economic point of view, this conclusion—though embraced in modern civil law—is not so obvious. See, Priest, The Modern Expansion of Tort Liability: Its Sources, Its Effects, and Its Reform, 5 J.Econ. Perspectives 31 (1991).

Similarly, in earlier years the law of corporations and of mergers and acquisitions was defined almost exclusively by the terms of corporate documents. Today, the papers of incorporation are often treated as only other obstacles that must be surpassed as part of the analysis of how to allocate risks that affect corporate ownership and structure. In recent highly publicized litigation involving mergers and acquisitions, for example, the issue before the court is whether the market for corporate control will be facilitated by assigning the risk and the commensurate benefits of some novel method of hostile takeover to current shareholders, to current management, or to the corporate raiders who have initiated the struggle.

The development of risk control as the central function of civil law has been most prominent in fields involving personal injury. As in other fields, this development has led to an extensive redefinition of legal issues. In cases involving claims of medical malpractice, for example, modern litigation extends far beyond the earlier relatively simple inquiry into whether the doctor was morally culpable for breaching standards of community practice. In the most sophisticated malpractice litigation today, the issue is one of risk and its control: Did the attending surgeon have sufficient control over the determinants of the risk of the medical maloccurrence to justify liability, or should that risk be assigned to supporting physicians or to the hospital vicariously through a judgment against its staff?

An important implication of the adoption of risk control as the principal function of civil law is that issues of motive and volition central to the legal regime that prevailed until the 1960s are rendered largely irrelevant. In modern contract law, for example, the decision of a party to intentionally breach a contract has little legal significance. It is acknowledged that the risks are omnipresent that changes in conditions will occur that might unsettle contracts and, thus, that it is inevitable that some contracts will be breached. The role of a court, as a result, is no longer to punish breach of contract, but to allocate between the parties the risks of such changes in underlying conditions. Similarly, though in earlier years it was necessary to demonstrate that a manufacturer had acted with bad motives or had behaved recklessly or negligently, such issues today are largely ignored. The concern of the courts has extended beyond specific bad motives to the broader risks of product injury. Thus, a manufacturer may have organized its production process with deep humanitarian concern for the welfare of its consumers, but if the company has miscalculated the risks and benefits of safety design, liability will follow immediately.

Many believe the derogation in civil law of issues of motive and volition as indicating a decline in commitment to individual responsibility or, perhaps, a shift of expectations toward an impersonal or a collective responsibility. The shift in standards of law may indirectly have that effect as citizens revise their expectations of the ultimate consequences of misoccurrences that afflict them. But I believe that the stimulus for the shift toward risk control as the central purpose of civil law is different and that it did not derive from a diminished conviction of the importance of individual responsibility.

The legal regime that prevailed from the 19th Century through the mid-1960s functioned chiefly by categorizing certain actions that generated loss as so particularly extreme or egregious as to deserve liability for any harm that resulted. Actions subject to legal liability were those for which there was a dramatically greater chance than normal that loss would result. According to this regime, prototypical candidates for liability were harms caused intentionally and those close to the intentional because of the high likelihood of injury.

Resolving disputes according to the standards of risk control is entirely different and implies vastly different methods of legal analysis. A property law whose focus is boundary disputes, a contract law whose focus is breach of promise, and a personal injury law whose focus is serious moral dereliction are each regimes in which the law defines a clear demarcation between acts subject to liability and acts immune from it. If the property line is transgressed, a trespass action will follow. If the contract is not performed, or if the injurer is morally culpable, damages will follow.

According to this earlier conception of the role of civil law, there are certain clear actions for which liability will apply, but equally clear sets for which liability is unavailable. Indeed, there are large sets of injuries suffered by property owners, parties to contracts, and injured victims that not only do not justify liability, but do not justify even judicial scrutiny. For example, under such a regime, a consumer injured by a product who cannot show that the product was intentionally or recklessly mis-manufactured or who cannot show clear moral negligence in the manufacturing process cannot recover damages. From the standpoint of the law, the product-related injury remains one of life's hazards to be suffered as best as possible according to the victim's resources, but without reference to the legal system. As another example, if a farmer promised to provide a broker 1,000 bushels of corn but because of drought can only provide 500, the farmer has breached the contract and must pay damages to the broker for the remainder. According to the law, the farmer must suffer the loss because it was the farmer, not the broker, who promised to deliver the corn.

This is not to suggest that the earlier regime was totally indifferent to conditions generating losses. If the probability of injury from product use were exceptionally high, the law could conclude that the manufacturer should have known of the product danger and find the manufacturer liable despite its claim of ignorance. Similarly, if the drought itself were so extreme that it prevented the farmer from delivering any of the 1,000 bushels, the law could relieve the farmer by rescinding the contract by finding it impossible to perform. Nevertheless, the method of analysis under the regime, even in these examples, was one of comparing the extremity of the factual context of the loss to some standard of normal or expected behavior.

According to this approach, some actions differ so dramatically from the normal—reckless manufacture or breach of contract—that legal liability is justified. Legal analysis under such a regime consisted of categorizing acts as either qualifying as sufficiently abnormal to justify liability or not. Obviously, intentional harm-causing actions justified liability. Beyond the intentional, unusually egregious actions may have justified liability. In almost all other cases, however, liability was unavailable, and the law allowed the loss to lie where it had fallen.

The adoption of risk control as the central goal of civil law rejects this categorical method of legal analysis. A law concerned with risk perceives losses as occurring probabilistically, with greater or lesser likelihood. Actions become subject to potential legal liability if they increase the occurrence of loss by some sufficient amount.

This shift does not reject, but builds upon, the liability of the previous regime. Losses caused intentionally or that are especially egregious remain subject to liability a fortiori. The frontier of liability, instead, is extended to disputes involving actions that increase the probability of loss by some dimension, though they may not make the loss inevitable or even highly likely. Thus, a manufacturer is made responsible for avoiding more than recklessly or egregiously negligent production methods; the manufacturer must monitor all potential sources of product risk and will be held liable whenever a risk eventuates that the manufacturer could readily have controlled. Thus, manufacturers of automobiles are routinely held liable for failing to design safety features in autos that would protect even drunk drivers from injuries resulting from the accidents they cause.

Similarly, liability for breach of contract induced by a drought will turn not on the simple issue of whether it was the farmer or the broker who breached the promise. Rather, the breach of promise is viewed as a probabilistic outcome of the drought. The issue in the case shifts to the question of the appropriate assignment of the risk of drought: Is it better to allocate the risk of drought to the individual farmer, locked into the specific climatic position of the farm, or to the broker, who can diversify drought risk by entering contracts with geographically disparate farmers?

A law concerned with risk control rejects a discrete demarcation between actions regarded as extreme and those regarded as normal. All actions can be arrayed on a continuum of contribution toward loss. Thus, central concepts of causation are changed dramatically. The earlier regime that imposed a sharp distinction between particularly extreme sources of harm and all others was necessarily committed to a very strict conception of causation. Actions were subject to liability for causing harm chiefly if they constituted the sole or exclusive source of the harm. In contrast, our modern civil law, devoted to risk control, focuses less upon strict causation than upon contribution to the occurrence of the harm. Some action may generate liability because of its contribution to the risk of occurrence, though it was only one of many simultaneously contributing sources of the loss.

The new regime of risk control thus vastly expands the opportunity for the attachment of legal liability as well as the importance of civil law as an instrument of social control. Many decry what they perceive as the increased litigiousness of modern society. But the level of litigiousness is only a function of the underlying legal rules in force. Our modern civil law encourages litigation as an instrument for internalizing costs to control risks. Because in our society intentionally or egregiously caused harms are infrequent, the earlier legal regime that focused only upon such harms was a regime of very limited scope. In contrast, our modern legal regime, focused upon every contribution to risk, is a regime of dramatically greater dimension. Such a regime aspires to impose legal controls on all activities in the society that contribute to risk in any way. Thus, virtually every action by every citizen becomes subject to potential legal review because every action will increase the risk of some loss in some way.

To my mind, far from incorporating a diminished view of individual responsibility, the shift of the law's purpose toward risk control represents a vastly expanded commitment to standards of individual liability, though expanded liability is somewhat different than enhanced individual responsibility. Under the new regime, an individual may be held liable not only for intentionally or maliciously harmful behavior, but for all behavior that increases the risk of loss, though the loss itself may be remote. Under earlier law, an individual needed to make certain only that his or her actions caused no direct injury to another individual. Under modern law, in contrast, an individual must make certain that his or her actions do not increase the risk of loss in any way. Thus, for each citizen, the potential of civil liability is vastly increased. The law charges each citizen to carefully monitor every action for its potential contribution to risk of loss.

From the standpoint of the control of risk, it is difficult to define a truly solitary act—an act that does not in some way implicate risks to others. The gardener spraying plants or the recluse reading silently before the fireplace may not be subject to liability personally for the increase in the collective social risk from pesticides or particulates, but will suffer the attachment of liability as pesticide or firewood prices rise or as the society proscribes such enjoyments directly. It is equally difficult in a society concerned with risk to truly shield or isolate oneself from others. The gardener's yield will be affected by the acidity of the rain, just as book prices will reflect the shift to acid-free paper. The centrality of risk effectively prevents all efforts of social escape.

Beyond increasing the scope of individual responsibility, the regime of risk control dramatically changes the substantive content of that responsibility. The focus of modern law on risk control diminishes the importance of moral standards in the evaluation of harm-causing activities. It is no longer useful in such a regime to distinguish between the guilty and the innocent or the culpable and the blameless. Almost every human action will increase the probability of some loss by some amount; empirically, it would be extremely rare for an action to contribute zero toward the probability of occurrence of all losses in all contexts. It follows, therefore, that under the modern conception of risk, no action is ever truly innocent. Each of us must recognize that all of our actions are likely to harm others in the society in some way. As a consequence, every citizen stands in a position of continuous potential interaction with the law since every action is potentially subject to liability. Indeed, each of us must be aware that many of our specific actions may well lie close to the point on the risk continuum at which the attachment of legal liability becomes socially worthwhile.

Once it is accepted that all actions can be arrayed at some point upon the risk-contribution continuum, sharp moral distinctions lose moment. It is no longer possible to clearly separate the moral quality of one's personal actions from the quality of the actions of others. On the risk-contribution continuum, there are no clear qualitative differences between actions whatsoever; all actions contribute something to risk. The only question is the extent of the contribution.

The decline in the importance of moral standards as grounds for comparing loss-contributing actions, however, should not be interpreted to suggest that our new legal regime of risk control lacks moral foundation. The moral foundation of the new regime is relentlessly utilitarian. The objective of controlling risk as effectively as possible prevails over all else. Civil law serves to internalize costs, first, to create incentives to reduce the risk level as much as is practicable placing liability on that party in the relatively better position to prevent it. Second, if the injury could not have been practicably prevented, liability will be placed on that party in the relatively better position to spread the risks of the injury as if an insurer.

The adoption of these two utilitarian principles of risk control has subtly changed the nature of modern adjudication. Modern trials have been transformed from disputes between individuals to occasions for judicial social engineering. In earlier days, the function of adjudication was to resolve specific controversies between often embittered parties. In such cases, the particular moral qualities of the parties or of their actions were of central importance, as issues of motive and goodwill were crucial. In modern litigation, in contrast, the court must evaluate, not how one individual or another behaved in a moment of crisis, but whether one party or another, as representatives of generic categories of actors, was in a better position to prevent injuries or to spread the costs of them. In litigation of this nature, the qualities of the actual litigants become irrelevant because the issue before the court is how best to fashion incentives for parties in such positions in the future. An obstetrician and a nurse-midwife may have dedicated their lives to serving others; in the incident before the court, they may have exerted great effort to help the injured child and suffered as deeply as the parents over the subsequent injury. But if the court determines that the risk of injury was within their control, that it was affected in any way by some technical decision made or ignored, or that the two professionals or their insurers were in the best position to spread such injury costs, liability for a lifetime of losses may be placed upon them.

In modern adjudication, the dispute between the specific litigants is of secondary, even trivial, importance to the exercise. The concern of the courts is how best to fashion broader incentives to maximize social welfare. The parties themselves and the loss one of them has suffered become mere informational inputs to the process of judicial revision of controlling rules of law. The legal claim serves only as an empirical example of a social problem for which a more specific legal rule defining behavior is needed. Frequently in modern litigation, the parties are unwitting instruments of this broader judicial purpose. But increasingly in recent years, the adversarial character of litigation has become pretended rather than real. The requirements of procedure compel the parties to defend contesting positions. Yet often the litigants and their attorneys play out their roles, not as hostile adversaries, but as characters, knowing that the drama being staged serves only to determine which of their insurers should foot the bill.

The new purpose of the law has led courts to adopt many novel and interesting rules that seem bizarre from the vantage point of earlier years. An example is the 1982 decision of the New Jersey Supreme Court in Beshada v. Johns-Manville, a relatively early case in the transformation of civil law.[28] The case involved a claim by a worker that an asbestos manufacturer should be liable for damages because the manufacturer had failed to warn the worker that asbestos could cause cancer. The manufacturer sought to defend the claim by proving that, at the time the worker contracted cancer, it was not known and could not have been known scientifically that asbestos causes cancer. More perceptive of the contours of our modern regime, the plaintiffs challenged the defense as irrelevant as a matter of law. The court concurred, holding that the manufacturer was liable for breaching its duty to warn the worker that asbestos causes cancer [28] 90 N.J. 191, 447 A. 2d 539 (1982).

though the court accepted that, at the time of the breach, it was impossible scientifically to have known that asbestos causes cancer

The notion of liability for breach of a duty with which it was impossible to comply seems to strain the most basic notions of responsibility. But responsibility in a regime of risk control has a very unusual meaning. According to the court, the manufacturer should be liable for the loss for two reasons. First, the decision improved incentives for accident avoidance: "By imposing on manufacturers the costs of failure to discover hazards, we create an incentive for them to invest more actively in safety research." Second, regardless of the information available at the time of injury, holding the manufacturer liable will serve to distribute the risks of product injuries broadly, because manufacturers can include expected injury costs in the prices of their products. Responsibility under the regime of risk control, thus, can mean a responsibility imposed ex post facto to reduce or to spread the risks of injuries.[29]

Many disapprove of the contours of modern civil law. But can those contours be changed? In my judgment, it is fanciful to imagine a return to the categorical analysis of civil law that prevailed until the 1960s. In retrospect, that legal regime was simplistic. There is a probabilistic character to all societal losses. All societal activities do implicate risks that some individuals will be harmed in some way.

The concept of internalizing costs to address those losses, however, can be substantially sharpened. As suggested earlier, Ronald Coase explained now forty years ago that, with respect to activity levels, injury costs are always internalized. Civil law is not needed to achieve the economic effect.[30] The question that remains is whether and how aggregate social welfare can be enhanced by shifting injury costs, which is to say, by changing the method of cost internalization.

[29] The Beshada opinion generate substantial criticism, and the New Jersey Supreme Court limited its scope to asbestos cases in Feldman v. Lederle Labs, 97 N.J. 429, 479 A. 2d 374 (1984). Several other jurisdictions, however, have adopted the approach.

Many have shown that employing civil law to provide insurance is counterproductive. Civil law may continue to possess a role, however, in creating incentives to directly reduce accident rates. Perhaps oddly, despite over forty years of experience with the expanded liability created by modern civil law, there are no empirical studies that have demonstrated that the expansion of liability has reduced the level of harm. Of course, there are strong market forces that generate greater levels of safety. No one has been able to show that legal liability serves to increase safety further.

Still, it remains possible that expanded liability enhances safety and thus that civil law can serve a regulatory role. It is an entirely separate question whether that regulation is sensibly administered through our adversarial process with the final decision delegated to lay juries, selected intentionally because their members know nothing about the subject before them. Put differently, we cannot imagine a regulatory agency such as, say, NHTSA setting standards for auto safety based upon the presentation of a claim by a single seriously injured individual with respect to that person's single accident, delegating the ultimate decision to laypersons.

Our modern regime of civil law, nevertheless, remains deeply entrenched both in terms of economic interests (note the to-date successful efforts of the trial bar and the unions to thwart the rejection of civil law with respect to asbestos-related injuries) and in popular conception. To change that legal regime in a serious way will require a substantial demonstration of the harms that it causes.

[30] Although Coase's article is widely known and universally accepted, this point remains not fully understood even among economists. For a prominent example, see Steven Shavell, Strict Liability Versus Negligence, 9 J. Legal Studies 1 (1980), discussed in Priest, Internalizing Costs (forthcoming).

How Did We Get Here? What Litigation Was, What It is Now, What It Might Be

By Stephen B. Presser[1]

Introduction: Law and Litigation on a Pernicious Precipice

In America, litigation is now a multi-billion dollar business.[2] This country has more lawyers as a percentage of the population than any other – a fact which is now notorious[3] – but less well understood is that our current civil justice system is not at all the way it used to be. We hardly blink at multi-billion dollar verdicts in class actions against corporations, and it is now common place for state attorneys general to seek million or billion dollar settlements against whole industries, an undertaking that New York Attorney General Spitzer, for example, has perfected to a high art. The suggestion that I will make here is that this is a departure from our heritage, and a marked change in the perception of what civil justice was supposed to be all about. Our English common law heritage was that lawsuits were supposed to be about settling intractable disputes between private parties about private rights, but the lawsuit, and particularly the class action, has now become more of an effort for wholesale vindication of purported constitutional or statutory policies.[4]

No other industrialized country reportedly pays more as a percentage of its Gross Domestic Product." (American Tort Reform Association's estimate, quoted on September 13, 2004). With the United States Population estimated at about 300, 000,000, this would work out to be 242.7 Billion dollars.

Our boast used to be that ours was a government of laws not men,[5] but the prejudices of particular litigants, the cooperation of complacent judges, and the misunderstandings of regulators and legislators have undermined what we used to have. Instead of a government of laws designed to protect the property and civil rights of individual citizens we may now have institutionalized lawsuit oppression and redistribution through the civil justice system. Instead of a civil justice system concerned with the preservation of individual liberty, and, in particular the liberty of entrepreneurs who furthered the economic well-being of society, we now have a civil justice system in which entrepreneurial actors can never be certain that they can avoid ending up as defendants in unpredictable lawsuits.[6]

How we got to the pernicious precipice on which we now stand is not an easy thing to discern, as it happened slowly and almost imperceptively as a part of a broader cultural change. Having no monarchy, no aristocracy, and no established church, we Americans have had only our law to bind us together, and, from the beginning, as Toqueville famously observed, the law was a vulgar tongue in this country.[7] Legislation and enlightened judges were early relied on to transform our English common law heritage into a body of doctrines and rules suitable for a young republic,[8] and the constitutional system of checks and balances, federalism, and judicial review in particular were supposed to ensure that the work of legislatures and trial courts did not undermine the protection of life, liberty, and property for which our revolution was fought and our Constitution ratified.[9] It does not go too far to say that the American Revolution ought to be conceived of as Englishmen fighting Englishmen for the rights of Englishmen, for the preservation of the rule of law and the English Common Law's protection of individuals against arbitrary power. The post-revolutionary institutions, and, in particular the federal Constitution ratified in 1789 had as its aim the preservation of the rule of law in general, and of individual liberty and private ownership of property in particular.[10]

Somehow, however, in the second half of the Twentieth Century, these checks and balances, that system of federalism, and the institution of judicial review came loose from their original moorings. The federal government, which had been set up as a means of protecting the rights of Americans, began instead seriously to encroach on them. It had been the early theory of the framers that the state and local governments ought to be the primary regulators, since the notion was that the government closest to the people would be most responsive to it.[11] From the fourth decade of the twentieth century, however, the administrative agencies spawned in the New Deal, and the federal courts combined to set national policy in a manner that began more seriously to restrict what state and local governments could do, and which rendered private property and individual liberty more precarious.

Expansively interpreting the Fourteenth Amendment and the bill of Rights, the federal courts decided that state legislatures had failed substantially to deliver justice to all, and the federal legislature, federal agencies,[12] and the federal courts subsequently emerged as major policy-makers for the nation.[13] Simultaneously, a significant part of the legal profession, which had formerly seen its role primarily as the preservers of property and the guardians of the civil rights of the citizenry now tended to become advocates against those running publicly-held corporations. Taking advantage of the [11] See, e.g. the Tenth Amendment, which provides that "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people," giving rise to the notion that the federal government is one of limited and enumerated powers, reserving the others to the state and local governments, those closest to the people. The idea that the government closest to the people was best appears to have been early associated with Jeffersonian Republicans, but most recently it has been embraced by the modern Republican party. See e.g. the remarks of Senator Fred Thompson, made on May 3, 1995:

> I would remind many of my Republican brethren that we ran for office and were elected last year on the basis of our strong belief that the government that is closest to the people is the best government; that Washington does not always know best; that more responsibility should be given to the States because that is where most of the creative ideas and innovations are happening. Whether it be unfunded mandates, welfare reform, or regulations that are strangling productivity, we took the stand that the States and local government should have a greater say about how people's lives are going to be run, and the Federal government less.

contingency fee system unavailable in other industrialized nations, plaintiffs' lawyers proceeded to transform the nature of litigation.[14] In order to understand the magnitude of the change it is important to understand what litigation once was, and what it might perhaps once again become.

What Litigation Once Was

Litigation as we now know it did not exist in our colonial past nor in our mother country. It is true that seeking redress through the courts is as old as the beginnings of British North America. The Massachusetts body of liberties agreed to by the colonists of Massachusetts Bay in 1641 provided that there was a "right of every citizen with a grievance to have some court adjudicate it," but the focus was very much on the individual rights of citizens,[15] and not on any group of similarly situated litigants. The common law, our English heritage of following precedents previously laid down, evolved a system of "common law" pleading whereby causes of action were clearly defined, and each one had a designated "writ" that would begin proceedings, and each one had particular pleadings that were to be filed as the proceedings were contested and litigated.

[14] Walter Olson, The Litigation Explosion 38 (1991) (indicating that contingency fees first arose as a means of ensuring that worthy and impecunious plaintiffs might still be able to gain redress, but that eventually contingency fees encouraged litigation that might well be meritless, but was driven by the possibility that lawyers might make more money.)

[15] To similar effect see III William Blackstone, commentaries on the Laws of England 2 (1768) ("The more effectually to accomplish the redress of private injuries, courts of justice are instituted in every civilized society, in order to protect the weak from the insults of the stronger, by expounding and enforcing those laws, by which rights are defined, and wrongs prohibited."), and Id, at 23 "it is a general and indisputable rule, that where there is a legal right, there is also a legal remedy, but suit or action at law, whenever that right is invaded." See also the Massachusetts Constitution of 1780, Declaration of Rights, Article XI, "Every subject of the Commonwealth ought to find a certain remedy by having recourse to the laws, for all injuries or wrongs which he may receive in his person, property or character. He ought to obtain right and justice freely, and without being obliged to purchase it; compleatly, and without any denial; promptly, and without delay; conformably to the laws."

It was a maxim that for every wrong there was a remedy at law, but the truth was that there were a myriad of matters that simply were outside the court system. Acts of God, inevitable accidents, sickness, death, and many other matters simply did not give rise to private causes of action. If one's case did not fit in the narrow definitions of trespass, trespass on the case, trover, replevin, assumpsit or the rest, one was simply out of luck.

Rather than seeking to eliminate this specialized system of redress for some, but clearly not all grievances, Americans as diverse as Alexander Hamilton, Thomas Jefferson, Joseph Story, and Abraham Lincoln all praised the wisdom of the common law and wished to preserve it for America, although abandoning the elements of the common law that sustained the English Aristocracy and Monarchy. Those parts of the common law that dealt with what we would now call contracts, property, torts, and civil rights, however, were preserved entire and intact. Thus, in a famous passage in Thomas Jefferson's Notes on Virginia, he reports that when, in 1776, he was assigned the task of suggesting revisions to the law of the new state of Virginia, he wanted to abolish slavery, to diminish the number of crimes that were punished capitally, and to set up an hierarchical public school system, but he wanted to preserve wholesale these parts of the common law of contracts, property, torts, and civil rights[16] (although he objected to the English practice of wearing of wigs in court).

It probably does not go too far to say that the old common law system of pleading, through specialized writs and arcane practices, because it required the assistance of lawyers, was designed to preserve and protect that class, and the obfuscatory character of common law pleading led some Americans even to suggest that lawyers ought not to be a necessary class in our republic.[17] Nevertheless, common law pleading, in some form, persisted until the first third of the twentieth century. One suspects that not only did common law pleading protect and advance the interest of lawyers, but this specialized system, by raising the costs of litigation, and by narrowing the bases for it, actually discouraged going to court. It was originally a mainstay of the Anglo-American legal culture that one should try one's best to resolve disputes out of court, that litigation was something of an evil, [18] and that it ought to be resorted to only if all other means failed. A litigious society was a fractured society, and many Americans valued community enough to erect roadblocks to discourage recourse to the courts. Common law pleading was a part of that, as were the old common law doctrines of champerty and maintenance that punished lawyers who actively stirred up litigation.[19] Indeed, Sir William Blackstone, the greatest Eighteenth Century commentator on the English Common Law, railed against those who promoted litigation, seeking to bargain for what we would now label contingency fees, calling them "the pests of civil society, that are perpetually endeavoring to disturb the repose of their neighbors, and officiously interfering in other men's quarrels."[20]

One of America's greatest lawyer-presidents made a similar point when he wrote, in an apparently undelivered law lecture, that good lawyers should

> [d]iscourage litigation. Persuade your neighbors to compromise whenever you can. Point out to them how the nominal winner is often a real loser -- in fees, expenses, and waste of time. As a peacemaker the lawyer has a superior opportunity of being a good man. There will still be business enough.
>
> Never stir up litigation. A worse man can scarcely be found than one who does this. Who can be more nearly a fiend than he who habitually overhauls the register of deeds in search of defects in titles, whereon to stir up strife, and put money in his pocket? A moral tone ought to be infused into the profession which should drive such men out of it.[21]

Code Pleading and Other Changes in Litigation

Somehow all of that began to change in the twentieth century, if not before. As early as the middle of the nineteenth century David Dudley Field (the lawyer who founded the first modern great law firm, Sherman and Sterling) successfully convinced New York legislators to replace the system of common law pleading with "code pleading."[22] This was a simplified procedure, dictated by statute rather than the common law, whereby litigants were no longer bound by the forms of action, but could much more simply state their cases and reply to their adversary's charges. The Field Code of Civil Procedure was adopted in whole or in part in twenty-four other states (and also in England and Ireland),[23] but common law pleading lingered well into the twentieth century, and, oddly enough, was still being taught to first-year law students in one civil procedure classes at Harvard in the fall of 1968.[24]

By 1937, however, the pressure to do away with common law pleading was irresistible, and in that year rules were promulgated for the federal courts that obliterated the writ system.[25] These new federal rules, or something like them, were soon adopted by many state courts as well, and the foundation for what Walter Olson has called "the litigation explosion"[26] was beginning to be erected. The notion that lawyers shouldn't encourage litigation was dealt a fatal blow by two key decisions, Bates v. State Bar of Arizona (1977),[27] in which the United States Supreme Court, in an opinion by justice Blackmun, who apparently wanted to encourage lawsuits and deplored the "underutilization" of lawyers' services,[28] held that the First Amendment protected lawyers "commercial speech" rights to advertise the availability and price of routine legal services, and Zauderer v. Office of Disciplinary Counsel (1985)[29], in which the Court permitted lawyers to solicit specific legal business against particular manufacturing defendants.[30]

Decisions such as Bates and Zauderer, and the increased availability of class actions, created a situation in which it was open season on assorted purported corporate wrongdoers. Litigation, in effect, became a pro-active means of redistribution, if not class warfare. With the rise of "public interest" lawfirms, or private or publicly-funded "legal aid" clinics, groups of lawyers were subsidized not by their potential clients, but by taxpayer or charitable contributions, and, as a result, even more litigation against particularly unfavored corporate or institutional defendants became possible.[31] Lawyers, rather than clients often came to control and encourage litigation. Blackstone and the old common lawyers would have been horrified.

Cultural Change led to Litigation Change

The changes in the nature of litigation undoubtedly were part of much broader cultural changes in this country, cultural changes which accelerated during the sixties and seventies. The story is a familiar one to those of us who lived through it, but since Americans tend to have little appreciation for their history, even their recent history, it may not be amiss to review some of those developments. Probably as a result of the deeply unpopular Vietnam conflict and the nearly contemporaneous Watergate affair (which still captures the imagination of many, as the recent revelation of "Deep Throat" shows) most Americans, and certainly most of what we now call the "mainstream media," appear to have come to believe that government could not be trusted, and that this was also true generally of large purportedly impersonal corporations. Perhaps as a result of the culture becoming increasingly dominated by the "baby boom" generation, and because that generation was characterized by much less religious and civic commitment than prior generations, and by a rather hedonistic individualism, it is not surprising that the law and legal institutions changed as well. As Americans searched for "self-actualization," as the conservative aspects of the legal profession which discouraged litigation began to erode, and as "public interest" law firms arose to become, as it were, professional plaintiffs, the law itself was eventually dramatically altered.

[31] Cf. Chayes, supra note ___, at 1291, observing that the class action "responds to the proliferation of more or less well-organized groups in our society and the tendency to perceive interests as group interest, at least in very important aspects." See, to similar effect, Olson, supra note ___, at 52-53, concluding that lawsuits were originally understood to be a dispute between two private citizens over private rights, but came to be understood as a tool to liberate people whose rights had been taken away, and to prevent such rights from being taken away in the future.

In particular, it became more and more difficult to argue that those who suffered any kind of harm, especially from use of commercially-manufactured products, were not entitled to compensation from the corporations who manufactured those items. Thus it was that "strict products liability" replaced negligence as the basis for manufacturer's liability to consumers, tenants became more easily able to look to landlords for any injury suffered by renters, and consumers found it easier to escape from contracts by arguing that businesses had taken "unconscionable" advantage of them.[32]

In the nineteenth century, in a period dominated by a culture of self-sacrifice and religious obligation, it may have been believed that limiting the liability of active individuals and organizations eventually redounded to the benefit of all, and by limiting such liability there would be more investment in productive enterprise, which would eventually result in greater overall wealth for the citizenry.[33] These were the days of "laissez-faire" when law and lawyers apparently believed that it was best to leave entrepreneurs substantially alone, and to let the market rather than the state or federal governments regulate enterprise.[34] New private law doctrines, however, seemed to have been spawned by a legal culture that favored regulation over acquiescence, and redistribution over private enterprise.

These private law developments, principally in the state courts, were the analogues of the public law developments, primarily in the federal courts, which also signaled major cultural change. Thus the Warren Court struck down school prayer and bible riding in the public schools in the states, mandated an end to racial segregation, declared that population was the only permissible basis for elections to either branches of the state legislature (even though the United States Senate itself furnished a glaring argument to the contrary), and dictated the reformation of state criminal procedure in order to prevent police abuse of criminal defendants, many of whom were believed to be members of disadvantaged minorities. Much of this was accomplished through the work of organizations formed at least in part to promote litigation, such as the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU), and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). Litigation, formerly a tool of last resort for individuals, now became a first choice method of social transformation for groups. None of this is necessarily to suggest that many or most of these individual decisions did not advance the cause of justice in their particular cases, but, taken together they contributed to a culture in which many more actors were subject to lawsuits, and in which bureaucracy could (even unintentionally) stifle enterprise.[35]

The last few years have seen the culmination of many of these efforts in even more daring judicial decisions, such as those that have found prohibitions in the Constitution against restricting abortions[36] and against punishing consensual homosexual acts,[37] or those that have read the Fourteenth Amendment to require mandatory busing of students to achieve racial balance in the schools,[38] or to permit affirmative action on the basis of race, at least in college and graduate school admissions.[39] All of these were United States Supreme Court decisions, but dramatic decisions in the state courts, such as that of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts which found in the Massachusetts state constitution a right to gay marriage,[40] were similar in spirit. In the Massachusetts gay marriage case, in fact, the Court relied heavily on the so-called "mystery passage" from one of the United States Supreme Court's abortion decisions, which stated that "At the heart of liberty is the right to define one's own concept of existence, of meaning, of the universe, and of the mystery of human life. Beliefs about these matters could not define the attributes of personhood were they formed under the compulsion of the state."[41] A more naïve or more extreme statement of hedonistic individualism would be difficult to articulate, and it summed up in few words the legal ethos of the age.

Again, however, it should be noted that the wisdom of the policies favoring abortion, the legalization of consensual homosexual acts, or gay marriage are not the issue addressed here. Instead it is the attitude of the Supreme Court that it should be the ultimate authority on these matters, guided by the philosophy encapsulated in the "mystery passage," and by a sense that it should authoritatively expand and alter the meaning of the Constitution in order to keep it in tune with the times. The mystery passage's philosophy leads to a view of society in which there is little common purpose, and an invitation to litigate against all traditional practices, instead of leaving matters to be worked out on a state-by-state basis through the emergence of a consensus among the people.

The reforms of Rule 23 which led to the class action as we know it were undoubtedly instituted because of a belief that an approach to litigation that enabled groups that had formerly been the subject of discrimination to join in seeking remedies would result in a more just society. Unfortunately, because of all the other cultural factors suggested here, the net effect of current class action practice may be to produce more harm than good.

Once the restrictive characteristics of the forms of action had been abandoned, and once an individualistic philosophy of the kind expressed in the mystery passage had taken hold, it might have been expected that a plethora of new causes of action would be created, and it was only a matter of time before the lawsuit as political tool could come into being. All that was needed was the abandonment of traditional institutional and cultural restraints on litigating.

This came when the individualistic philosophy of the mystery passage, for most purposes, obliterated an older Athenian or Judeo-Christian ethos, still dominant in the Nineteenth Century, which understood reversals of fortune or accidental bereavement as occasions for spiritual growth, rather than opportunities for seeking redress in the courts. As the federal courts continued to render decisions which all but obliterated the legitimacy of religious expressions in the public square,[42] the restraining character of religion eroded, and the "litigation explosion" occurred.

And thus we have the current situation where plaintiffs' lawyers, in effect, manufacture classes suffering injury, often in an effort to seek settlements for their "nuisance value," rather than actually to recover compensation for purported victims. Similarly, as indicated earlier, we have state attorneys general pursuing actions against whole industries, as has been done, for example, against the tobacco industry, seeking to enhance state revenues through spectacular recoveries, or, as New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer has done against the Insurance and Mutual Fund industries, to reinforce his political standing and solidify a possible bit for higher office (or so his critics suggest).[43]

In short, litigation conceived as a remedy for the redress of individual grievances has become a political device to be used by ambitious office-holders as well as an instrument of intimidation by ambitious private lawyers.

Some Ameliorative Efforts

There have been some successes in reigning in the bringing of lawsuits and the activities of professional plaintiffs in the securities fraud area, in medical malpractice awards, and in other areas of civil justice reform, but there are still difficulties unique to the American legal system at the moment, and utterly unknown to the common law.

The most prominent of these has already been mentioned; the ability of plaintiffs' lawyers to take on cases on a contingent fee basis, and to advertise for clients, thus generating litigation on their own. Another is that we have not yet adopted the English "loser pays" rule, requiring that successful litigants have their counsel fees reimbursed by the unsuccessful party. Still another difficulty is our extraordinary system of pre-trial discovery, in which depositions, interrogatories, requests for document production, and other means of obtaining evidence from adversaries can easily run the costs of litigation for large publicly-held corporations into the millions, and can serve as powerful incentives to settle even meritless cases.

The United States Supreme Court, and some state legislatures have begun to take steps to reduce the colossal punitive damage verdicts we have seen in recent years,[44] but these efforts, especially by the state legislatures have sometimes been frustrated by state courts.[45] For the time being it is likely that the possibility of colossal punitive damages will continue to threaten corporate defendants, and, when the threat of punitive damages is combined with adverse inferences to be drawn from a failure to produce items for discovery, as recently occurred in the Morgan Stanley case,[46] it can be understood what a distance we have traveled from the time when litigation was about compensation, and compensation to individuals, not punishment of purported corporate miscreants.

Conclusion: What Ought to be Done

The organization that has sponsored this conference, Common Good, is devoted to reminding us of what our American ancestors understood, that social problems can be exacerbated rather than ameliorated by excessive litigation. As Philip Howard has recently demonstrated, for example, the encouragement of litigation by school children and their parents has resulted in a situation where order simply cannot be maintained in the classroom – where it is necessary to bring in the police to handcuff and cart away young miscreants lest some teacher be sued for an attempt physically to restrain an unruly child.[47] The lack of order in classrooms, of course, impedes their educational mission, and while encouraging litigation against educators was suppose to improve education, it has had the opposite effect.

[46] The Supreme Court does seem to have begun to understand that adverse inferences because of failures to produce may have gone too far, or at least this is one interpretation of the recent decision the Arthur Andersen case, where a unanimous court threw out a criminal prosecution based on jury instructions which condemned a possibly lawful document destruction policy.

Similarly, to the extent that class action litigation against corporations, along with its attendant evils of contingency fees, excessive discovery expenses, the threat of punitive damages, the capricious behavior of juries, and the bringing of class-action lawsuits with the aim of settlement for their nuisance value,[48] continues, the competitive position of American corporations in the global economy will be undermined, and those who depend on such corporations for their livelihood, employees, creditors, consumers and stockholders will suffer. There will continue to be a few spectacular winners in the "lawsuit lottery," but most Americans may be worse, rather than better off.

Congress may have begun to travel the appropriate road to recovery with the recent reform regarding class actions,[49] but this has yet to be tested in the courts, and [48] As one of the leading civil procedure scholars, my colleague Martin Redish has observed "Though on its face the class action appears to be nothing more than an elaborate procedural joinder device, in recent years it has become the focal point of much political and legal debate. Courts have noted 'the intense presser to settle' caused by the very filing of a class action, while others believe the procedure amounts to 'judicial blackmail.'" Martin H. Redish, "Class Actions and the Democratic Difficulty: Rethinking the Intersection of Private Litigation and Public Goals," 2003 The University of Chicago Legal Forum 71. (footnotes omitted). Redish does go on to observe, however, that "Those who take a more positive view of the class action consider it to be an effective means of policing corporate behavior and an assurance that injured victims will be compensated in the most efficient manner." Id. (footnote omitted). Redish's own view is that current class action practice is inconsistent with popular sovereignty, or "the essential democratic precepts of accountability and representation." Id., at 137.

[49] The Class Action Fairness Act of 2005, which passed the House in a 279-149 vote and the Senate by a vote of 72-26, would move lawsuits seeking over $5 million, and thus "shift most large class-action lawsuits involving parties from different states to federal courts." The goal of the measure is to lessen the perceived arbitrary behavior of state court judges and juries. See generally William Branigin, "Congress Changes Class Action Rules," Washington Post, February 17, 2005. The new law does not, however, prevent the bringing of any class actions in federal courts, nor did it have any retroactive effect. In addition to shifting some class action lawsuits to federal courts the new law also should have the effect of other Congressional measures, such as Sarbanes-Oxley, suggest that our legislators may still be imposing measures whose costs far exceed their benefits.[50] One recent estimate "puts investors' loss in stock value on passage of that act at around $1.4 trillion, an expensive bit of retribution for a few multi-million dollar defalcations."[51] There is no denying that transparency in American entrepreneurial activity is a worthy goal, and the disclosure mandated by our securities laws and the efforts of the SEC and the courts to ferret out and punish securities fraud are certainly laudable. Nevertheless, it is time for intelligent leaders in and out of the Congress boldly to seek to change not only the pernicious practices and rules that have encouraged lawsuit abuse, but perhaps the very culture that has spawned them.[52]

As indicated above, there was a time when lawsuits were discouraged, and when the legal rules clearly favored the American active entrepreneur. There has always been some uncertainty to American law, dictated by its need simultaneously to implement reducing the recovery of counsel's contingency fees in class action litigation that results in coupons being distributed to members of the class. The contingency fees are to be figured on the basis of the value of the coupons redeemed rather than on the aggregate value of the coupons issued. popular sovereignty, economic development, restraints on arbitrary power, and the securing of a maximum amount of freedom from government regulation.[53] Before the middle of the twentieth century our legal and cultural regime discouraged litigation, and entrepreneurs had the freedom successfully to develop our economy to the point where it became the envy of the world.

That economy still flourishes, but it now does so in a climate in which no entrepreneur, and perhaps no American can be confident that he or she will not find themselves the subject of a lawsuit brought by a disgruntled competitor, an ambitious politician, or misguided government regulators. Surely at some point this climate will discourage the kinds of activities that Americans must engage in if we are to remain competitive in an increasingly-global economy. It is time for a change. We Americans tend to believe that one can't turn back the clock, but, as C.S. Lewis reminded us, when the clock fails to give you the correct time, that is precisely the move one should make.[54] If we really do want to alter a culture in which entrepreneurial actors and ordinary Americans, instead of being protected by law may too often end up its victims, there are lessons we could surely learn from our past.

But I would rather get away from that whole idea of clocks. We all want progress. But progress means getting nearer to the place where you want to be. And if your have taken a wrong turning, then to go forward does not get you any nearer. If you are on the wrong road, progress means doing an about-turn and walking back to the right road . . . .").

Dear Neil,

Just a quick note to thank you for taking the time out to talk to the departing Marshall Scholars. They thoroughly enjoyed your guided tour through the UK as a whole and the idioms of Oxford. Those who were Oxford bound had a very interesting time explaining some of the language to their peers who were headed towards the far flung environs of Scotland, York and even East Anglia.

This is only my second year of working on this particular British initiative and it is clear that all of us involved with the programme owe a debt to those of you who are prepared to help and ensure that the Orientation Programme is fun, interesting and enlightening.

Craig Schiffries, the Chair of the Washington DC Regional Selection Committee for the Marshall Scholarships, very much enjoyed meeting you and indicated he would welcome you as a Selection Committee Member in the future. Perhaps if the planets align we might be able to schedule this at some point in the not too distant future – do hope so.

Thanks again, best to Louise and les petites.

The Office of Economic Adjustment, a field activity within the Department of Defense, assists communities, regions, and States adversely impacted by significant Defense program changes. OEA provides hands-on technical assistance as well as financial and other resources for reuse planning of closed or realigned military installations. Over the past four decades OEA has helped hundreds of U.S. communities develop economic strategies to adjust to defense industry cutbacks, base closures, and force structure realignments, and to develop compatible land use strategies to mitigate encroachment at the nation's military installations.

BRAC
BASE REALIGNMENT AND CLOSURE
Supporting Communities, Workers and Businesses through Transition

WORKFORCE INVESTMENT SYSTEM RESOURCES AVAILABLE TO COMMUNITY LEADERS

Workforce Investment Act (WIA) Formula Grants – Under WIA, states are provided with a formula allotment of federal funds which they use to provide employment and training services to adults and dislocated workers. These dollars are in turn passed down by formula to local communities to fund employment and training services through One-Stop Career Centers. The One-Stop Career Centers provide a full array of services to help employers find the skilled labor they seek and help ensure job seekers get good jobs with good pay and career pathways. Transitioning workers (BRAC impacted workers, veterans, military spouses, and others) can access career guidance, information on local labor markets including available jobs, job search coaching, information on training availability, training and educational opportunities, and job placement services. These dollars also fund Rapid Response Teams that go onsite to assist workers by providing employment and training information, arranging for benefits (such as Unemployment Insurance), and registering individuals for more in-depth help and support.

Workforce Investment Act (WIA) 15% Governor's Set Aside For Statewide Activities - 15% of a state's WIA formula grant can be reserved by the Governor for special statewide activities. These extremely flexible dollars can be used in many ways and allow Governors to arrange for the provision of innovative training for incumbent workers.

Workforce Investment Act (WIA) National Emergency BRAC Planning Grants – The Secretary of Labor is making available from her discretionary funds grants to states for BRAC 2005. These grants will be available for planning to assist communities, workers and businesses affected by BRAC. A single application may cover more than one military installation as applicable to a state, or contiguous states that share the same facility. Applications will be due by June 10, 2005, and processed on a fast track by June 30, 2005.

For questions related to these resources on other DOL employment and training programs, please e-mail BRACquestions@dol.gov.

Dear Mr. Gorsuch: Neil –

The Department of Justice has received your name as among those we should consider recommending to the President for nomination to the federal judiciary. The Department's recommendations are based upon careful investigation and evaluation of your qualifications and background. To facilitate the investigation, kindly provide the information requested below as soon as possible, and in no event later than the deadlines set forth below.

In the enclosed packet of security documents, please find a Questionnaire for National Security Positions and related supplemental and waiver forms. This questionnaire, the supplements and associated waivers need to be returned immediately so that the Federal Bureau of Investigation can commence its background investigation.

Also enclosed are questionnaires from the White House and the United States Senate. In preparing your response to these forms, please restate the question to which each answer relates. We must have your response to both questionnaires within one week so that the Department can begin its process of evaluating your professional qualifications.

Additionally, please provide five examples of your legal writing that reflect your legal and written communication skills. Please be mindful of any need to protect client privilege and as necessary delete any portions that are deemed privileged. If you do not have five samples of legal writing, please provide other examples of your written communication skills.

Finally, we have enclosed a medical evaluation, to be completed by your physician after a physical examination, and the Financial Disclosure Report required by the Ethics in Government Act of 1978. Please return the medical evaluation and Financial Disclosure Report as soon as practicable.

Thank you for your continued patience with this important evaluation process and for your cooperation in strictly observing the deadlines prescribed above. Please return the completed documents, preferably using an overnight delivery service, to Mr. David T. Questionnaire for National Security Positions

Follow instructions fully or we cannot process your form. Be sure to sign and date the certification statement on page 9 and the release on page 10. If you have any questions, call the office that gave you the form.

Purpose of this form

The U.S. Government conducts background investigations and reinvestigations to establish that military personnel, applicants for or incumbents in national security positions, either employed by the Government or working for Government contractors, licensees, certificate holders, and grantees, are eligible for a required security clearance. Information from this form is used primarily as the basis for investigation for access to classified information or special nuclear information or material. Complete this form only after a conditional offer of employment has been made for a position requiring a security clearance.

Giving us the information we ask for is voluntary. However, we may not be able to complete your investigation, or complete it in a timely manner, if you don't give us each item of information we request. This may affect your placement or security clearance prospects.

Authority to Request this Information

Depending upon the purpose of your investigation, the U.S. Government is authorized to ask for this information under Executive Orders 10450, 10865, 12333, and 12356; sections 3301 and 9101 of title 5, U.S. Code; sections 2165 and 2201 of title 42, U.S. Code; sections 781 to 887 of title 50, U.S. Code; and parts 5, 732, and 736 of Title 5, Code of Federal Regulations.

Your Social Security Number is needed to keep records accurate, because other people may have the same name and birth date. Executive Order 9397 also asks Federal agencies to use this number to help identify individuals in agency records.

The Investigative Process

Background investigations for national security positions are conducted to develop information to show whether you are reliable, trustworthy, of good conduct and character, and loyal to the United States. The information that you provide on this form is confirmed during the investigation. Investigation may extend beyond the time covered by this form when necessary to resolve issues. Your current employer must be contacted as part of the investigation, even if you have previously indicated on applications or other forms that you do not want this.

In addition to the questions on this form, inquiry also is made about a person's adherence to security requirements, honesty and integrity, vulnerability to exploitation or coercion, falsification, misrepresentation, and any other behavior, activities, or associations that tend to show the person is not reliable, trustworthy, or loyal.

Your Personal Interview

Some investigations will include an interview with you as a normal part of the investigative process. This provides you the opportunity to update, clarify, and explain information on your form more completely, which often helps to complete your investigation faster. It is important that the interview be conducted as soon as possible after you are contacted. Postponements will delay the processing of your investigation, and declining to be interviewed may result in your investigation being delayed or canceled.

You will be asked to bring identification with your picture on it, such as a valid State driver's license, to the interview. There are other documents you may be asked to bring to verify your identity as well. These include documentation of any legal name change, Social Security card, and/or birth certificate.

You may also be asked to bring documents about information you provided on the form or other matters requiring specific attention. These matters include alien registration, delinquent loans or taxes, bankruptcy, judgments, liens, or other financial obligations, agreements involving child custody or support, alimony or property settlements, arrests, convictions, probation, and/or parole.

Organization of this Form

This form has two parts. Part 1 asks for background information, including where you have lived, gone to school, and worked. Part 2 asks about your activities and such matters as firings from a job, criminal history record, use of illegal drugs, and abuse of alcohol.

In answering all questions on this form, keep in mind that your answers are considered together with the information obtained in the investigation to reach an appropriate adjudication.

Instructions for Completing this Form

1. Follow the instructions given to you by the person who gave you the form and any other clarifying instructions furnished by that person to assist you in completion of the form. Find out how many copies of the form you are to turn in. You must sign and date, in black ink, the original and each copy you submit. You should retain a copy of the completed form for your records.

2. Type or legibly print your answers in black ink (if your form is not legible, it will not be accepted). You may also be asked to submit your form in an approved electronic format.

3. All questions on this form must be answered. If no response is necessary or applicable, indicate this on the form (for example, enter "None" or "N/A"). If you find that you cannot report an exact date, approximate or estimate the date to the best of your ability and indicate this by marking "APPROX." or "EST."

4. Any changes that you make to this form after you sign it must be initialed and dated by you. Under certain limited circumstances, agencies may modify the form consistent with your intent.

5. You must use the State codes (abbreviations) listed on the back of this page when you fill out this form. Do not abbreviate the names of cities or foreign countries.

6. The 5-digit postal ZIP codes are needed to speed the processing of your investigation. The office that provided the form will assist you in completing the ZIP codes.

7. All telephone numbers must include area codes.

8. All dates provided on this form must be in Month/Day/Year or Month/Year format. Use numbers (1-12) to indicate months. For example, June 8, 1978, should be shown as 6/8/78.

9. Whenever "City (Country)" is shown in an address block, also provide in that block the name of the country when the address is outside the United States.

10. If you need additional space to list your residences or employments/self-employments/unemployments or education, you should use a continuation sheet, SF 86A. If additional space is needed to answer other items, use a blank piece of paper. Each blank piece of paper you use must contain your name and Social Security Number at the top of the page.

DOJ_NMG_0142891

Final Determination on Your Eligibility

Final determination on your eligibility for access to classified information is the responsibility of the Federal agency that requested your investigation. You may be provided the opportunity personally to explain, refute, or clarify any information before a final decision is made.

Penalties for Inaccurate or False Statements

The U.S. Criminal Code (title 18, section 1001) provides that knowingly falsifying or concealing a material fact is a felony which may result in fines of up to $10,000, and/or 5 years imprisonment, or both. In addition, Federal agencies generally fire, do not grant a security clearance, or disqualify individuals who have materially and deliberately falsified these forms, and this remains a part of the permanent record for future placements. Because the position for which you are being considered is a sensitive one, your trustworthiness is a very important consideration in deciding your eligibility for a security clearance. Your prospects of placement or security clearance are better if you answer all questions truthfully and completely. You will have adequate opportunity to explain any information you give us on the form and to make your comments part of the record.

Disclosure of Information

The information you give us is for the purpose of investigating you for a national security position; we will protect it from unauthorized disclosure. The collection, maintenance, and disclosure of background investigative information is governed by the Privacy Act. The agency which requested the investigation and the agency which conducted the investigation have published notices in the Federal Register describing the systems of records in which your records will be maintained. You may obtain copies of the relevant notices from the person who gave you this form. The information on this form, and information we collect during an investigation may be disclosed without your consent as permitted by the Privacy Act (5 USC 552a (b)) and as follows:

PRIVACY ACT ROUTINE USES

1. To the Department of Justice when: (a) the agency or any component thereof; or (b) any employee of the agency in his or her official capacity; or (c) any employee of the agency in his or her individual capacity where the Department of Justice has agreed to represent the employee; or (d) the United States Government, is a party to litigation or has interest in such litigation, and by careful review, the agency determines that the records are both relevant and necessary to the litigation and the use of such records by the Department of Justice is therefore deemed by the agency to be for a purpose that is compatible with the purpose for which the agency collected the records.

2. To a court or adjudicative body in a proceeding when: (a) the agency or any component thereof; or (b) any employee of the agency in his or her official capacity; or (c) any employee of the agency in his or her individual capacity where the Department of Justice has agreed to represent the employee; or (d) the United States Government, is a party to litigation or has interest in such litigation, and by careful review, the agency determines that the records are both relevant and necessary to the litigation and the use of such records is therefore deemed by the agency to be for a purpose that is compatible with the purpose for which the agency collected the records.

3. Except as noted in Question 24, when a record on its face, or in conjunction with other records, indicates a violation or potential violation of law, whether civil, criminal, or regulatory in nature, and whether arising by general statute, particular program statute, regulation, rule, or order issued pursuant thereto, the relevant records may be disclosed to the appropriate Federal, foreign, State, local, tribal, or other public authority responsible for enforcing, investigating or prosecuting such violation or charged with enforcing or implementing the statute, rule, regulation, or order.

No disclosure will be made unless the information has been determined to be sufficiently reliable to support a referral to another office within the agency or to another Federal agency for criminal, civil, administrative, personnel, or regulatory action.

6. To contractors, grantees, experts, consultants, or volunteers when necessary to perform a function or service related to this record for which they have been engaged. Such recipients shall be required to comply with the Privacy Act of 1974, as amended.

MEMORANDUM FOR PROSPECTIVE JUDICIAL NOMINEES

The attached packet of forms must be completed by all prospective judicial nominees. Although the forms may be repetitive, each does have a different purpose – and therefore, we ask your assistance in completing all of them.

The attached forms include the following:

- Personal Data Statement: This form is prescribed by the White House Counsel's Office for all prospective appointees.

- FBI Background Investigation Forms: The Standard Form 86, along with various waivers to include a tax-check waiver and two fingerprint cards, are required of all potential nominees, so that the FBI can conduct its routine background investigation. We are asking you to complete the forms now for our internal review; you will be notified before we direct the FBI to begin any investigation. Please see the separate cover memorandum on FBI clearances for detailed instructions on completing these forms. It may be possible for you to download an electronic version from www.opm.gov. After you reach the OPM web site, look under forms, then standard forms and find SF-86.

- Senate Judiciary Committee Questionnaire: This form is prescribed by the Judiciary Committee, for its review should the President decide to nominate you. Again, the draft you provide us now is for our internal use only; you will have a chance to prepare and review a final draft before it is submitted to the Senate. Thus, please disregard for now the form's instructions to submit 18 copies to the Committee.

- Financial Disclosure Report (AO-10): This form is required by the Ethics in Government Act. This form is required to be filed within five days of your name being transmitted to the Senate. Because this form must be reviewed and be in compliance with the provisions of the ethics act, we ask that you complete this form now and return it for our review.

We are asking you to complete all of these forms now – even those involving aspects of the nomination process that are not yet pressing – to avoid later delays in the review process

If so, list, with dates of membership. What you have done to try to change these policies?

5. Please discuss your views on the following criticism involving "judicial activism."

   The role of the Federal judiciary within the Federal government, and within society generally, has become the subject of increasing controversy in recent years. It has become the target of both popular and academic criticism that alleges that the judicial branch has usurped-many of the prerogatives of other branches and levels of government.

DOJ_NMG_0142927

Some of the characteristics of this "judicial activism" have been said to include:

a. A tendency by the judiciary toward problem-solution rather than grievance-resolution;

b. A tendency by the judiciary to employ the individual plaintiff as a vehicle for the imposition of far-reaching orders extending to broad classes of individuals;

c. A tendency by the judiciary to impose broad, affirmative duties upon governments and society;

d. A tendency by the judiciary toward loosening jurisdictional requirements such as standing and ripeness; and

e. A tendency by the judiciary to impose itself upon other institutions in the manner of an administrator with continuing oversight responsibilities.

IV. CONFIDENTIAL

1. Full name (include any former names used).

2. Address: List current place of residence and office addresses). List all office and home telephone numbers where you may be reached.

3. Have you ever been discharged from employment for any reason or have you ever resigned after being informed that your employer intended to discharge you?

4. Have you and your spouse filed and paid all taxes (federal, state and local) as of the date of your nomination? Please indicate if you filed "married filing separately". Did you make any back tax payments prior to your nominations? If so, give full details.

5. Has a tax lien or other collection procedure ( ) ever been instituted against you by federal, state, or local authorities? If so, give full details.

6. Have you or your spouse ever been the subject of any audit, investigation, or inquiry for either federal, state, or local taxes? If so, give full details.

7. Have you or your spouse ever declared bankruptcy? If so, give particulars.

8. Have you to your knowledge ever been under federal, state, or local investigation for a possible violation of either a civil or criminal statute or administrative agency regulation? If so, give full details. Has any organization of which you were an officer, director, or active participant ever been the subject of such an investigation with respect to activities within your responsibility? If so, give full details.

9. Have you ever been the subject of a complaint to any court, administrative agency, bar association, disciplinary committee, or other professional group for a breach of ethics, unprofessional conduct or a violation of any rule of practice? If so, give particulars.

10. Have you ever been a party (whether plaintiff, defendant or in any other capacity) to any litigation?

11. Please advise the Committee of any unfavorable information that may affect your nomination.

Re: Nomination Financial Disclosure Filing

Dear Nominee:

The Ethics in Government Act of 1978 (5 U.S.C. app., §§ 101-111) requires the filing of a financial disclosure report from a nominee within five days of transmittal of his or her nomination by the President to the Senate. Financial disclosure reports for judicial nominees are reviewed by the Judicial Conference of the United States Committee on Financial Disclosure. A copy of the judiciary's filing form (AO Form 10) and the filing instructions for preparing the report are enclosed for your use. All financial disclosure reports must be filed on the AO Form 10.

Your initial report is due five calendar days from the date that your nomination is forwarded to the Senate. As an initial report, block 6 must cover the time period from January 1, 2004, to a date that precedes the "Date of Report" in block 3 by no more than 30 days. In Part III, you must also report compensation, other than from the United States Government, earned in excess of $5,000 during calendar year 2003. All items on the form must be completed except Parts IV and V, relating to Reimbursements and Gifts; and Part VII, Column D, pertaining to transactions. You should write "exempt" in these spaces.

While the statute requires a timely filing, reasonable extensions of time to file can be granted, although the total extension may not exceed ninety days. Requests for extensions must be submitted to the Committee before the due date. See "Extensions of Time to File," page 3 of the filing instructions.

Please note the provisions of section 104(d), which impose a filing fee of $200 for a report filed more than 30 days after the due date. Upon written request by the filer, the fee may be waived by the Committee, but only for extraordinary circumstances. Please see page 3 of the enclosed filing instructions for the regulations on filing fees.

A copy of the financial disclosure software CD and software instructions are enclosed to assist you in the preparation of your report. Once you have entered the appropriate information, the program will allow you to print a copy of the completed report form. If you experience problems with the software, please call (202) 502-1850 for assistance.

The original and three copies of the report should be filed at the above address.

This report will be a public document open for inspection at the Office of the Committee on Financial Disclosure. You will be notified if, upon a proper request, the report is made available.

If you need assistance with completing the AO Form 10 or have questions about the filing instructions, please call the Committee office at (202) 502-1850 for assistance.

Sincerely,

George D. Reynolds

Rules Applicable to Financial Disclosure Reports filed by Nominees for Judicial Office

Special rules govern the information to be disclosed in parts of the financial disclosure report, as indicated in the following paragraphs. With the exception of the items specified here, all other provisions of the filing instructions are applicable to nomination reports.

Personal Information

Court or Organization - Block 2

Enter the name of the court or organization to which you are being nominated, even if you are currently serving in a different court. For example, a district court judge being nominated to the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit should enter "6th Circuit" (example: page 5).

Date of Report - Block 3

Enter the date that the report is being completed, which must be no more than 5 days after the date inserted after "Nomination, Date" in Block 5. 5 U.S.C. app. §101(b)(1) (example: page 5).

Title - Block 4

Enter the title of the position to which you are being nominated, even if you are currently serving in a different court. For example, a district court judge being nominated to a circuit judgeship should enter "Circuit Judge."

Nomination Date - Block 5

A nominee for judicial office should check "Nomination" in Block 5 and also insert the date on which his or her nomination was transmitted to the Senate (example: page 5).

Reporting Period - Block 6

The beginning date should be January 1 of the year preceding the year you were nominated. The ending date must be no earlier than 30 days before the "Date of Report" in Block 3. For instance, if you are nominated on March 20, 2005, and submit your report on March 25, 2005, the beginning date must be January 1, 2004, and the ending date should be no later than March 25, 2005 nor earlier than February 25, 2005 (example: page 5).

Part III: Non-investment Income

A nomination report must disclose the source, nature, and the amount of non-investment income received by the filer from any one source that:

1) exceeded $200 during the reporting period (shown in Block 6); and

2) exceeded $5,000 during the two calendar years preceding the year of filing (example: page 7). [Note that because the reporting period already includes the calendar year preceding the year of filing, in effect this adds one year of information.]

For the filer's spouse, the report must also disclose the source and the nature of non-investment income that exceeded $1,000 from any one source and any honoraria exceeding $200 received during the reporting period shown in Block 6 (example: page 5). If you are not married, you may leave section B blank. If you are married but your spouse received no reportable income, check the "None" box.

Part IV: Reimbursements

A nominee is exempt from completing this part. Write "Exempt" on the first line of this part (example: page 8). However, you should note the requirements for this section set forth in the filing instructions to assist you in preparing future annual reports.

Part V: Gifts

A nominee is exempt from completing this part. Write "Exempt" on the first line of this part (example: page 8). However, you should note the requirements for this section set forth in the filing instructions to assist you in preparing future annual reports.

Part VII: Investments and Trusts

Columns D(1) - (5): Transactions

A nominee is exempt from completing Column D in this part regarding transactions involving investment assets. Write "Exempt" in Column D on the first line of this part (examples: pages 10 and 12). However, you should note the requirements for this section set forth in the filing instructions to assist you in preparing future annual reports.

Avoiding Common Errors

The following are the errors most frequently noted on nomination reports. Please review your report carefully to avoid these errors.

Prior year's income: In Part III, you must disclose income earned in the calendar year preceding the year of nomination and the calendar year before that. If your only source of income for any of those years was exempt from disclosure, e.g., United States government salary, include an explanatory note in Part VIII in order to avoid an inquiry.

Family members: Do not list the name of any family member or a description of the family relationship (e.g., "spouse," "son," "daughter," or "family") in any part of the report, unless required to identify the debtor on a note receivable.

Mutual fund names: In Part VII, list the name of the specific fund (e.g., "Fidelity Aggressive Growth Fund") rather than the name of the sponsoring investment company (e.g. "Fidelity Investments").

Assets held in brokerage accounts and IRAs: In Part VII, for a brokerage account or an IRA composed of stocks and bonds, you must list each asset (stock, bond, or mutual fund) that exceeds $1,000 in value or from which you received more than $200 during the reporting period. Listing of the brokerage account or IRA alone is not sufficient.

Investment income: In Part VII, Column B must be completed for each asset. If no dividend or interest income was received, leave Column B(1) blank and enter "None" in Column B(2). Capital gains from the sale of an asset are not reported in Column B.

Description of investment income: Investment income reported in Column B of Part VII should be described only as "dividends," "interest," "rent," "mineral royalty," or "distribution" (e.g., partnership income). Any type of income credited to a mutual fund account (usually a combination of dividends, interest, and capital gains from the fund's sales of stock) may be described as "dividend." For any type of income not listed, please call the Committee office at (202) 502-1850 for guidance.

Value codes: In Part VII, if an asset was owned at the end of the reporting period, you must disclose a value code in Column C(1) and indicate the method of valuation in Column C(2). If the asset was entirely sold before the end of the reporting period, both Columns C(1) and C(2) should be blank.

Bank names: In Part VII, you must disclose the name of any bank or other financial institution in which you have a deposit account (checking, savings, money market). This includes cash management accounts in brokerages, which often hold money market accounts.

Block 6 - Reporting Period: Any entry that does not cover both the current calendar year up to a date no earlier than 30 days before the date in Block 3 and the preceding calendar year will result in a letter requesting amendment of your report.

Positions: When you list a position as a trustee, executor, or a similar position, you must also list in Part VII the assets in the trust or estate for which the position is held. If there are no reportable assets in the trust, an explanatory note should be included in Part VIII (Instructions, pages 9, 42, and 57).

Brokerage accounts - income and value: The income and value of assets held in brokerage accounts must be reported individually. Do not report the aggregate value and income of a brokerage account (Instructions, pages 56).

Part VII - Value Codes: The use of value method codes "Q," "R," "S," and "V" in Column C(2) requires additional information in Column A or Part VIII (Instructions, pages 48-50).

❶ On a nomination report, you are exempt from reporting information on transactions that occurred during the reporting period.

❷ If "R" is used as the valuation method, the date of purchase and the amount of the purchase price must be listed (see Column A).

❸ If no income is received, enter "None" in Column B(2). Do not leave Column B blank for any asset.

❹ If "V" is used as the valuation method, an explanation of the method must be provided. See example of note in Part VIII.

❺ If "Q" is used as the valuation method, the date of the appraisal must be provided. In this example, it is assumed that the asset was inherited and the value disclosed is the appraisal conducted for estate purposes (see Column A).

❼ If an asset is entirely sold before the end of the reporting period, Column C should be left blank.

❽ For a note or account receivable, the name of the debtor must be provided. While you should generally omit the name of any family member as it is not required to complete your report, the name of any person indebted to you through a note or account receivable is required in this section.

❾ If the fund is controlled by a current or former employer, and the individual cannot select stocks, bonds, or other assets for purchase or sale, report only the name of the fund and not the underlying assets. If the participant can select the investments in the fund (as in an IRA), the individual assets must be disclosed as shown in the example on page 12.

❿ If income from a pension is credited to the individual's account, it should be disclosed as income in Column B. Where income is a mixture of interest, dividends, and capital gain distributions, you may describe it as "dividends."

① If the fund does not credit earnings to individual accounts, but reflects the participant's share as "units" or other designations of the proportional share, enter "None" in Column B(2).

② If the value of your pension is provided in an annual report to participants, you may report it as book value -"U" - or as cash/market value - "T."

③ For a life insurance policy, disclose only the "cash value" component, not the death benefit or "face value."

Major Changes to Financial Disclosure Instructions for 2005

The release to the public of information contained in the financial disclosure reports may increase the risks of identity theft and other financial fraud to filers and their families. The Security Issues page has been revised to provide more detailed assistance to filers to avoid these risks while complying with the statutory requirements to disclose specified types of information.

The instructions have been amended to emphasize that filers are required to provide the specific name of a money market fund in which they have invested. For example, a brokerage may invest client funds in "Putnam Tax Exempt Money Market Fund" pending investment in stocks or bonds. The filer should list the full name of the fund rather than listing "Cash" or "Money Market Account." This change is reflected on page 37 of the filing instructions.

The filing instructions have also been revised to clarify the requirements for reporting corporate name changes resulting from mergers and other business reorganizations. This change is reflected on page 51 of the instructions.

Issued January 3, 2005

SECURITY ISSUES

Every filer should be aware that the Ethics in Government Act of 1978 makes your Financial Disclosure Report a PUBLIC DOCUMENT. This means that a person seeking to harm or harass you and your family can get a copy of your Financial Disclosure Report. There have been instances of such misuse of information provided by filers. The Committee makes the following recommendations so that you can satisfy the financial disclosure requirements of the Act while accommodating appropriate security concerns:

(1) When filing your report, enter your CHAMBERS OR OFFICE ADDRESS in Block 7. Do not disclose your home address for any purpose in connection with your report.

(2) Do not provide unnecessary detail that could enable someone to commit financial fraud. For example:
   a) Do not list account numbers for bank or brokerage accounts
      - For banks, provide only the name of the institution, e.g., "First National Bank accounts"
      - Brokerage accounts should be designated by number, e.g., "Brokerage Account #1";
   b) Do not list a Social Security number;
   c) List only the name of a bank, not its address or the name of a branch you frequent, e.g., "First National Bank" rather than "First National Bank, Smallville Branch."

(3) For rental properties, provide only the city (or county) and state in which the property is located. Do not use street addresses, lot numbers, or survey descriptions. You may identify multiple properties as "Rental Property #1, Cincinnati, Ohio," "Rental Property #2, Cincinnati, Ohio," and so on.

(4) Do not report your personal residence or residences in Part VII (unless a portion of your residence is rented to a third party). Similarly, do not report any mortgage, equity loan, or line of credit secured by a personal residence, vehicle, boat, or motor home in Part VI.

(5) Do not identify relatives by name or designation such as "brother" or "mother-in-law." Identify a trust or estate by number, such as "Trust #2," "Estate #1."

(6) Do not attach financial statements, tax returns, deeds, or trust agreements - these often include home addresses and account numbers.

If the providing of specific information would create a security risk, you may request redaction of the required information pursuant to the Regulations of the Judicial Conference on

Issued January 3, 2005

Access to Financial Disclosure Reports. A request for redaction should be submitted in a letter separate from your financial disclosure report. See pages 62 and 63 of the filing instructions.

If your Financial Disclosure Report is requested, you will be notified of the request. If you have any concerns or questions about the release of your report, please call the staff of the Committee at (202) 502-1850 or discuss the matter with your local United States Marshal.

INTRODUCTION

Three types of Financial Disclosure Reports--initial, annual, and final--are required by the Ethics in Government Act of 1978, as amended, published in Title 5 of the United States Code, Appendix, §§ 101-111.

These filing instructions govern the preparation and filing of AO Form 10, which is to be used by judicial officers and employees for all reports due after January 1, 2005. The body of the filing instructions covers reporting requirements for annual reports, which in some cases also apply to initial and final reports. Where requirements for initial and final reports differ from the annual reporting requirements, specific information can be found in Appendices I and II, respectively, of these instructions.

The Act requires that the Committee on Financial Disclosure review each report to assure that, on the basis of the information provided, the reporting person is in compliance with applicable laws and regulations. Section 106(b)(1). The Committee also reviews reports to determine potential conflicts of interest or ethical problems.

Questions concerning the reporting requirements (and suggestions for improving the AO Form 10 or these instructions) should be addressed to: Committee on Financial Disclosure, Administrative Office of the United States Courts, Suite 2-301, One Columbus Circle, N.E., Washington, D.C. 20544.

WHO MUST FILE, WHEN AND WHERE

JUDICIAL OFFICERS AND JUDICIAL EMPLOYEES are required to file an annual report by May 15 following each calendar year in which they performed their duties for more than sixty (60) days. Section 101(d). Filing before the due date is encouraged to ease the burden on members of the Committee on Financial Disclosure who review the reports, as required by the Act.

JUDICIAL OFFICERS are defined in the Act as the Chief Justice and Associate Justices of the Supreme Court, and the judges of United States courts of appeals, United States district courts, including the district courts in Guam, the Northern Mariana Islands, and the Virgin Islands, Court of International Trade, Tax Court, Court of Federal Claims, Court of Veterans Appeals, United States Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces, and any court created by an Act of Congress, the judges of which are entitled to hold office during good behavior. Section 109(10).

A JUDICIAL EMPLOYEE is any employee, other than a JUDICIAL OFFICER of the judicial branch of Government, of the United States Sentencing Commission, of the Tax Court, of the Court of Federal Claims, of the Court of Veterans Appeals, or of the United States Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces, who

(a) is authorized to perform adjudicatory functions with respect to proceedings in the judicial branch, e.g., bankruptcy judges and magistrate judges; or

(b) occupies a position for which the rate of basic pay is equal to or greater than 120 percent of the minimum rate of basic pay payable for GS-15 of the General Schedule. Section 109(8).

Persons whose obligation to file reports may vary from year to year, e.g., a senior judge, or recalled bankruptcy judge or magistrate judge who may perform more than 60 days of service in one year but not in another, should certify their exempt status to the Committee on Financial Disclosure by May 15th, if they are exempt from filing for the prior year. This will avoid an inquiry from the Committee concerning failure to file. When they file their next reports, they should explain any apparent inconsistencies resulting from the "gap" between the two reporting periods.

For information on who must file initial and final reports, and when they must be filed, see Appendices I and II, respectively.

Commentary

The General Counsel of the Administrative Office has determined that the term "basic pay" within the definition of a judicial employee does not include locality pay or geographic cost-of-living allowance (COLA) received by some employees in Alaska, Guam, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands. Geographic COLAs are considered additional allowances for the cost of living rather than part of the basic rate of pay. Similarly, there is no express statutory authority permitting court employees to receive locality pay. Payment is based upon the Director of the Administrative Office's authority to set compensation and is treated in the same manner that locality pay is treated in the Executive Branch, which does not consider locality pay as a part of basic pay.

Part-time employees without adjudicatory functions are deemed to satisfy the filing threshold if the basic rate of pay fixed for the position held meets the statutory minimum. Thus, the "rate of basic pay" rather than actual pay received, is used to determine the need to file a report. In addition, the Committee has held that the "rate of basic pay" to be used to determine whether a reemployed annuitant who is not authorized to perform adjudicatory functions must file a report does not include the annuity.

A part-time magistrate judge whose annual salary level is less than 16.4% of the salary of a full-time magistrate judge will normally perform the duties of his or her office for less than sixty-one (61) days each year and accordingly is not required to notify the Committee of his or her exempt status.

Extensions of Time to File

The Committee on Financial Disclosure may grant reasonable extensions of time for filing initial, annual, and final reports. Requests for extension should be submitted to the Committee before the due date, in writing signed by the filer explaining why the extension is necessary. The maximum extension permitted by the Act is 90 days. Section 101(g).

Emergency requests for extension may be made by telephone to the Committee staff if the reason for the request could not have been reasonably anticipated. A letter confirming the request should be sent promptly to the Committee. A letter confirming the oral response will be sent promptly by the Committee.

Filing Fee

The statute requires a person to file a timely report. One who files a report more than thirty (30) days after the date the report was due may be assessed a filing fee of $200.00. If for good reason it is necessary to request a delay in filing, extensions of time of up to 90 days may be granted by the Committee on Financial Disclosure. The statute states that extensions beyond 90 days are not permissible. Absent a waiver, those granted a full 90 day extension will have to pay the fee if they do not file by the 120th day. Section 104(d)(1).

The Committee may waive the filing fee for extraordinary circumstances. Requests for waivers must be submitted in writing to the Committee with explanation of the reason(s) the report was not filed on time. Section 104(d)(2).

Commentary

When a report is filed more than 30 days after the date it is due, the filer is assessed a late filing fee of $200. The fee is deposited in the United States Treasury. If a filer requests a waiver of the fee due to extraordinary circumstances, the Committee has delegated the authority to approve waivers to the Subcommittee on Compliance. Please note, that reports are deemed to have been filed ten (10) days prior to physical receipt for the purpose of determining whether the report has been timely filed.

Where to File

The original and three copies of the report, and of any amendments (including amendments in response to letters of inquiry) are to be filed with:

Committee on Financial Disclosure
Administrative Office of the United States Courts
Suite 2-301
One Columbus Circle, N.E.
Washington, D.C. 20544

Section 103(h)(1)(B).

The additional copies of the report may be made by photocopying the original, rather than by retyping or using carbons.

Commentary

Reports are not considered to have been received unless they are physically received by the staff of the Committee on Financial Disclosure and contain an original signature of the filer. Reports will be date stamped as soon as they are received by the staff. Reports sent to the Committee on Financial Disclosure by facsimile or other electronic means are not considered to be received until a copy with an original signature is received.

Amendments

A report may be amended by filing an amended AO Form 10 for that year, fully explaining items added to, or changed from, the original submission.

Alternatively, additional information may be submitted by a separate letter addressed to the Committee. You should identify the report(s) and part(s) being corrected and provide complete information for the item(s) being corrected. Sign the letter personally, which will constitute your certification to the accuracy and completeness of the report(s) as amended.

Regardless of which method is used, you should file amendments in the same manner as for the original, i.e., a signed original and three copies with the Committee.

Commentary

Self-initiated amendments will be certified in the same manner as an original report. Each reviewer will complete Block 8 on the AO Form 10 for each amendment as amended.

DOJ_NMG_0142965

Amendments must be submitted over the signature of the filer. Amendments submitted on the filer's behalf by accountants, lawyers, or others are not acceptable.

Waivers

The Committee may grant a request for a waiver of any reporting requirement for one who is expected to perform the duties of the office or position less than one hundred and thirty (130) days in a calendar year, but only if the Committee determines that:

(1) the person is not a full-time employee of the federal government;

(2) the person is able to provide services specially needed by the federal government;

(3) it is unlikely that the person's outside employment or financial interests will create a conflict of interest; and

(4) public financial disclosure by the person is not necessary under the circumstances.

Any request for such a waiver must be directed in writing to the Committee with a detailed explanation of the facts upon which the Committee can make the determinations required under the Act. All such requests are available to the public. Section 101(i).

GENERAL INSTRUCTIONS

The report should be legible. Its format has been designed to be completed on most typewriters. The name of the person and date of the report should appear on each page. Financial Disclosure Report software is available upon request from the Committee.

"None" Box

Parts I through VII of the report must be completed. If you have no reportable items in any of these parts, do not simply leave it blank or mark it as "N/A," but instead mark the "None" box as an affirmative declaration of the fact.

Disclosure Concerning Family Members

A reporting person is required to disclose financial information concerning a spouse and dependent children, and the form is designed for inclusion of this information. Section 102(e)(1). The requirement to disclose trust information for a spouse and dependent children only when a beneficial interest exists is found on pages 58 and 59. The Act does not require disclosure of the financial interests of other family members, nor is it required with respect to a spouse who is living separate and apart with the intention of terminating the marriage or permanently separating. Section 102(e)(2).

The Act defines a dependent child as a "son, daughter, stepson, or stepdaughter . . . who--

(A) is unmarried and under age 21 and is living in the household of the reporting person; or
(B) is a dependent of the reporting person within the meaning of Section 152 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986." (26 U.S.C. § 152)

Section 109(2).

Extra Pages; Attachments

If more space is needed for any part than is provided on the form, make the additional entries on a new page and include it as a numbered attachment. The identifying information (name and date of report) must appear on each attachment page. If you make these entries on other than a photocopy of a page from the form, make sure that the part being continued is indicated and that all the required information is given.

Alternative Format For Reporting

The computer program available from the Committee provides an acceptable format for reporting.

It is permissible in exceptional circumstances to provide the required information in any part of the report in an alternative format but only upon a specific written determination by the Committee that such alternative reporting is acceptable. Those wishing to use alternative formats should seek permission to do so by writing to the Committee stating in detail the format to be used, why the request is being made, and whether it is for the current report only or for future reports, as well. All information submitted must be in a format easily reconciled with prior reports. Section 102(b)(2)(A).

In the absence of permission to use an alternative format, no extrinsic reports or documents may be used as substitutes for disclosure on the AO Form 10 as provided. This limitation is necessary to avoid additional burdens that would occur in the review process if a variety of documents, with different formats and often with extraneous information, were permitted.

Reconciliation with Prior Reports

Each report should be complete in itself. No information may be adopted by reference to prior reports. If letters approving a specific transaction, position, or agreement have been received from the Committee, or if the Committee on Codes of Conduct has approved particular conduct or actions, a copy of the letter of approval should be attached to each report to avoid a letter of inquiry.

Compare the information on your current report with that in the prior report to assure that each is complete and correct.

To assist the Committee during the review process, list items in each part of the report in the same order as shown in the prior report (placing any new items at the bottom of the list or of the appropriate subdivision of the list).

INSTRUCTIONS FOR COMPLETING EACH PART

I. Positions

Only information pertaining to the reporting person is required in this part.

In this part, a complete listing is required of all positions held by the reporting person as an officer, director, executor, administrator, trustee, guardian, custodian, or similar fiduciary, partner, proprietor, representative, employee, or consultant of any corporation, company, firm, partnership, or other business enterprise, any nonprofit organization, any labor organization, or any educational or other institution other than the United States. Disclose your position even if you are not compensated and even if neither you nor a member of your family has any financial interest in the entities herein listed. Please note that positions held are reported in this part while assets owned or held are reported in Part VII. You need not report any positions held in any religious, social, fraternal, or political entity and positions solely of an honorary nature. Section 102(a)(6)(A).

In completing this part, for annual reports, the reporting period consists of the calendar year preceding the date of the report, and the time to the date of the report. Section 102(a)(6)(A). For initial and final reports, refer to Appendices I and II, respectively, of these instructions.

An interest as a limited partner in an investment partnership, if you have no managerial responsibilities, reflects assets held or owned, but not a position held. The position as such a limited partner need not be reported in Part I, but the interest must be disclosed in Part VII.

For Article III judges, bankruptcy judges, and magistrate judges, the Codes of Conduct for United States Judges specify additional constraints on the positions that may be held. See especially Canon 5. Part-time magistrate judges are governed by special rules as provided in 28 U.S.C. § 632(b) and the Guide to Judiciary Policies and Procedures, Volume II, Chapters I and III.

Additional information--e.g., an opinion from the Committee on the Codes of Conduct, or approval from a Judicial Council--that bears on the question whether a position presents a potential conflict of interest problem or problem under the Code of Conduct for United States Judges should be provided in Part I or Part VIII or on an attached page.

If you did not hold any reportable positions at any time during the reporting period, check the "None" box rather than leaving Part I blank.

I. POSITIONS. (Reporting individual only; see pp. 9-13 of Instructions.)

☐ NONE (No reportable positions)

2 Trustee	Trust #1

Notes to filer:

____ Do you have any reportable positions ? If not, is the NONE box checked?

____ Did you provide the full name of the position and the organization?

____ Does the position appear to represent a conflict of interest?

____ Does the position require a listing of assets in Part VII?

Commentary

In completing this part, the reporting period is not always consistent with the reporting period delineated in Block 6 of the heading. For annual reports, the reporting period consists of the calendar year of the report and the current year up to the date of the report.

A power of attorney need not be reported in Part I if it has not been exercised, as for example, if it is conditioned upon an event that has not yet occurred, such as the disability of the grantor. Once a power of attorney has been exercised, it should be reported in Part I, and all investment assets subject to that power of attorney should be disclosed in Part VII. Similarly a filer is not required to report a position as "successor trustee" or similar fiduciary position that is contingent upon an event that has not occurred.

The positions a filer can hold are normally determined by the filer's status. Each category is affected by the Canons and statutes governing the creation and duties of the position held. Examples are as follows:

Judges

A judge should not serve as the executor, administrator, trustee, guardian, or other fiduciary, except for the estate, trust, or person of a member of the judge's family, and then only if such service will not interfere with the proper performance of judicial duties. "Member of the judge's family means any relative of a judge by blood, adoption, or marriage or any other person treated by a judge as a member of the judge's family." (Canon 5D.)

The duties of a co-trustee are, while nominal, fiduciary in nature. Canon 5D would seem to rule out service as fiduciary for other than a trust for a member of the judge's family. Service as a fiduciary for other than a member of the family is permitted to continue in limited circumstances, as provided in the Code's "Applicable Date of Compliance" section, but this section seems to contemplate a relationship with an individual rather than with a pension plan. In any event, even such a nonfamily fiduciary relationship is to be terminated as stated in the Compliance section. (Advisory Opinion No. 33.)

A judge who, before ascending the bench, served as an executor of the estate of a nonfamily member, or as trustee of a nonfamily trust may, with the approval of the judicial council of the circuit, continue in that capacity if resignation would cause undue hardship to the estate and its beneficiaries, but may not receive compensation for such service. (Compendium § 5.1-3(a) (2003).)

Note: A judge may serve as a part-time special lecturer in law or as a faculty member at a law school. It is necessary for the judge to obtain advance approval from the chief judge of the circuit, or in the case of the chief judge from the judicial council, before engaging in teaching activity. The normal restrictions on extra judicial compensation apply; the compensation must be reasonable in amount, no greater than a similarly situated non-judge would receive for the same service; the 15% cap on outside earned income is applicable; and the payments must be included in Part III of the report. The teaching duties should not in any way interfere with the performance of judicial duties.

Where a judge failed to obtain prior approval of teaching, the Chief Judge has authority to approve teaching for compensation nunc pro tunc if satisfied that the failure was occasioned by excusable neglect, the application would have been approved if timely filed, and other criteria for approval are satisfied. If circumstances do not justify nunc pro tunc approval, the judge's only recourse is to refund the compensation. (Compendium § 35.7 (2003).)

In a partnership engaged in real estate investment, a judge may have a passive investment as a general partner. Canon 5C(2) prohibits active business participation.

The listing of a position as partner in a business in Part I will ordinarily require a listing of the income and value of the business in Part VII. If the partnership owns or trades in securities and the filer can influence the selection of assets for purchase or sale, the individual stocks and transactions should be reported in Part VII.

It is permissible for a judge to be an uncompensated officer or director of a business wholly owned by members of the judge's family. (Compendium § 5.2-3(c)(2003).)

A judge may serve as a member of the board of directors of a nonprofit social club, or a nonprofit club whose object is to promote an interest in and to enlighten its membership on important governmental, economic and social issues, provided that (a) the club does not engage in partisan political activity and (b) the judge does not take positions on governmental, economic, and social issues which would embarrass the judge in the exercise of judicial duties. (Advisory Opinion No. 15.)

A judge may serve on the board of trustees of a university foundation (no fund-raising involved). Same for service on a university advisory board. (Compendium § 5.3-3(b)(2003).)

Senior judges designated in 5 U.S.C. app. § 502(b), (justices and senior judges) are excluded from the 15% cap on compensation received from approved teaching. Even if the Ethics Reform Act is satisfied, provisions of the Code of Conduct for United States Judges must also be satisfied.

Part-time Magistrate Judges

Part-time United States magistrate judges render such service as judicial officers as is required by law. While so serving they may engage in the practice of law, but may not serve as counsel in any criminal action in any court of the United States, or act in any capacity that is inconsistent with the proper discharge of their office. Within such restrictions, they may engage in any other business, occupation, or employment which is not inconsistent with the expeditious, proper, and impartial performance of their duties as judicial officers. (28 U.S.C. § 632(b).)

Judicial Employees

a. No covered senior employee, as defined in the "Regulations of the Judicial Conference of the United States Under Title VI of the Ethics Reform Act of 1989 Concerning Outside Earned Income, Honoraria, and Outside Employment," Guide to Judiciary Policies and Procedures, Volume II, Chapter VI, Part H, shall:

(1) affiliate with or be employed by a firm, partnership, association, corporation, or other entity to provide professional services which involve a fiduciary relationship for compensation;

(2) permit the use of his or her name by any such firm, partnership, association, corporation, or other entity;

(3) practice a profession which involves a fiduciary relationship for compensation;

(4) serve for compensation as an officer or member of the board of any association, corporation, or other entity; or

(5) receive compensation for teaching, without the prior notification and approval as herein provided.

Note: Senior employees of the Court of International Trade or the Court of Federal Claims must obtain approval from the chief judges of those courts. Senior employees of the Tax Court must obtain approval from the chief judge of the Tax Court. Commissioners and senior employees of the Sentencing Commission shall obtain approval from the Chairman of the Sentencing Commission. Senior employees of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts must obtain approval from the Director of the Administrative Office.

b. Judicial Employees. A judicial employee may engage in such activities as civic, charitable, religious, professional, educational, cultural, avocational, social, fraternal, and recreational activities, and may speak, write, lecture, and teach. If such outside activities concern the law, the legal system, or the administration of justice, the judicial employee should first consult with the appointing authority. (Code of Conduct for Judicial Employees, Canon 4A.)

c. Federal Public Defenders. A defender employee should not engage in the private practice of law. Notwithstanding this prohibition, a defender employee may act pro se and may, without compensation, give legal advice to and draft or review documents for a member of the defender employee's family, so long as such work does not present an appearance of impropriety and does not interfere with the defender employee's primary responsibility to the defender office. (Code of Conduct for Federal Public Defender Employees, Canon 5D.)

II. Agreements

Only information pertaining to the reporting person is required in this part.

In this part a complete listing is required of any agreement with respect to:

(a) future employment;

(b) a leave of absence during government service;

(c) continuation of payments by a former employer other than the United States; and

(d) continuing participation in an employee welfare or benefit plan maintained by a former employer.

Report the date, parties, and terms of the agreement. Section 102(a)(7).

For all reports, show any such agreements currently in force.

Any additional information--e.g., an opinion from the Committee on Codes of Conduct, or approval from a Judicial Council--that bears upon the question whether an agreement presents a potential conflict of interest problem or problem under the Codes of Conduct for United States Judges should be provided in Part II or on an attached page.

If you did not have any reportable agreements during the reporting period, check the "None" box, rather than leaving Part II blank.

Commentary

Continuation of payments by a former employer other than the United States

It is permissible for judges to receive appropriate payment for their interests in a law firm and compensation for legal services they rendered before becoming judges. (Compendium § 2.7(a)(2003).)

A termination of partnership agreement provides for payment of an agreed amount representing the retiring partner's interest and some of these payments can be paid in years following the partner's appointment as a United States judge. (Advisory Opinion No. 24.)

The Committee on Codes of Conduct is of the opinion that when a partner leaves a law firm to become a federal judge, he should, if possible, agree with his partners on an exact amount which he will receive for his interest in the firm, whether that sum is to be paid within the year or over a period of years. (Id.)

Such agreed-upon payments may continue to be made to the judge, provided it is clear (1) that he is not sharing in profits of the firm earned after the judge's departure, as distinguished from sharing in an amount representing the fair value of the judge's interest in the firm, including the fair value of the judge's interest in fees to be collected in the future for work done before leaving the firm, and (2) such judge does not participate in any case in which the former firm or any partner or associate thereof is counsel until the full amount which he or she may be entitled to receive under the agreement has been paid. (Id.)

It is permissible for the departing judge to share in contingent fees received at the end of the litigation, provided a fixed percentage or fixed ceiling is agreed upon, and reasonably reflects the value of services previously rendered by the departing judge. While it is permissible for a judge to share in future contingent fees under the circumstances previously set forth, the judge should first attempt to reach agreement with his former partners on a fixed sum. (Compendium § 2.7(b) and (b-1)(2003).)

Continuing participation in an employee welfare or benefit plan maintained by a former employer

A judge should remove his or her retirement account from a former law firm's profit-sharing trust where members of former law firm appear regularly in federal court in the judge's district requiring frequent disqualification by the judge. If the judge's continued recusal would impose a significant burden on other judges, the judge should ordinarily withdraw the account if feasible. (Compendium § 5.2-4(a) and (a-1)(2003).)

When, long after the judge's departure, additional assets are discovered which should have been transferred to the judge at the time of his departure (delayed refund under health insurance plan), there is no ethical impediment to the judge's receipt of the appropriate distribution. (Compendium § 2-7(e)(2003).)

A judge who is a participant in a law firm's KEOGH plan has a financial interest in all of the corporations whose stock is owned by the plan, and must keep informed of the plan's investments, unless the plan is a common fund. (Compendium § 3.1-1(i)(2003).)

A law firm's KEOGH plan or 401K plan (managed by the firm, small number of participants, ready access to investment information) does not qualify for the "common fund" exception. A law firm's retirement fund qualifies for the "common investment fund" exception where the financial interest is indirect (due to the number of participants and the size and diversity of investments), directed investment by participants is not available, and the participants do not know and cannot easily find out about a fund's portfolio, which turns over frequently. (Compendium § 3.1-3(c) (2003).)

Other Employment

Part-time United States magistrates render such service as judicial officers as is required by law. While so serving, they may engage in the practice of law and, within certain restrictions, engage in any other employment which is not consistent with the expeditious, proper, and impartial performance of their duties as judicial officers. (28 U.S.C. § 632.)

A part-time judge is a judge who serves on a continuing or periodic basis, but is permitted by law to devote time to some other profession or occupation and whose compensation for that reason is less than that of a full-time judge. A part-time judge: (1) is not required to comply with Canons 5C(2), D, E, F, and G, and Canon 6C; (2) except as provided in the Conflict-of-Interest Rules for Part-time Magistrate Judges, should not practice law in the court on which the judge serves or in any court subject to the appellate jurisdiction of the court on which the judge serves, or act as a lawyer in a proceeding in which the judge has served as a judge or in any other proceeding related thereto.

The judge should take reasonable steps to require that law clerks keep the judge informed of their future employment plans and prospects. Participation by the law clerk in a pending case involving the prospective employer may reasonably create an appearance of impropriety and a cause for concern on the part of opposing counsel. A former law clerk should be disqualified from work in the United States attorney's office on any cases that were pending in the court during the law clerk's employment with the court. (Advisory Opinions Nos. 74 and 81.)

III. Non-investment Income

Information pertaining to the reporting person and the spouse, as noted, is required in this part.

A. General Non-investment Income

In this part, report non-investment income from whatever source, including but not limited to these items: compensation for services, including fees, commissions, etc.; income derived from business; royalties from intellectual property such as copyrights; and fixed benefits from vested pension plans. Amounts reported should be net income, except for income derived from a business, can be listed as net or gross, and indicated as such. Section 109(7).

Report the source, type, amount or value, of income from any source aggregating $200 or more in value. Honoraria are treated differently. Section 102(a)(1)(A). See Part III B. below. See below for specific exemptions.

If a spouse is self-employed in business or a profession, only the nature of such business or profession should be reported. A spouse is "self-employed" with regard to the net earnings derived from a profession or business carried on by the spouse as a sole proprietor or a partnership of which the spouse is a member. See Treas. Reg. 26 C.F.R. § 1.1401-1(c). Otherwise, for spouses, report the source of items of earned income from any person which exceeds $1,000 and the source and amount of any honoraria which exceed $200.

Each filer must complete Part III A., and if married during any portion of the reporting period, provide the information in PART III B. for his or her spouse. The amount of earned income in Part III B. need not be shown except for honoraria.

You are not required to disclose in Part III the following:

- compensation for current employment by the United States. Section 102(a)(1)(A).
- income that from a single source did not aggregate $200 or more during the reporting period. Section 102(a)(1)(A).
- the amount of the spouse's "earned income," or any information about that "earned income" that from a single source did not aggregate more than $1,000 during the reporting period. Section 102(e)(1)(A).
- any information about dependent children's non-investment income. Section 102(e)(1)(A).

- information with respect to a spouse living separate and apart with the intention of terminating the marriage or providing for permanent separation or with respect to any income or obligations arising from the dissolution or permanent separation. Section 102(e)(2).

- any political campaign funds, including campaign receipts. Section 102(g).

- income derived from any retirement system under title 5, United States Code (including the Thrift Savings Plan under Subchapter III of Chapter 84 of such title) or any other retirement system maintained by the United States for officers or employees of the United States. Section 102(i)(1).

- benefits received from Social Security. Section 102(i)(2).

- death benefits under insurance policies, gifts, inheritances, tort recoveries and other compensation for injuries and sickness, disability compensation, and veteran's benefits.

III. NON-INVESTMENT INCOME. (Reporting individual and spouse; see pp. 17-24 of Instructions.)

	DATE	SOURCE AND TYPE	GROSS AMOUNT
A. Filer's Non-Investment Income
☐	NONE (No reportable non-investment income.)

Notes to filer:

____ Do you have any reportable non-investment income over $200.00?

____ Does your spouse have any reportable non-investment income over $1,000.00?

____ If no reportable income, is the NONE box checked?

____ Is the date, source, type, and amount for your reportable income reported?

____ Is the income subject to the 15% limitation ($23,715) for calendar year 2004?

____ Is the income an honorarium or reported as such?

Commentary

Although various types of non-investment income have been listed, some elaboration on several sources of income may be useful to provide a clearer distinction between non-investment and investment income.

No income should be disclosed in this part if it is derived from an investment asset that should be reported in Part VII. Thus, a "royalty" received from the use or sale of copyright, patent, or other legally recognized intellectual property rights should be reported in Part III, but a "royalty" or any other payment from ownership or investment in oil, gas, or other mineral interests or enterprises should be disclosed in Part VII.

Annuity Income: Income received from an annuity purchased by the filer should be reported in Part VII rather than in Part III as it represents a return on the filer's investment. Similarly, where a filer has converted an IRA or other account to an annuity, the value of the annuity and income paid pursuant to the annuity should be reported in Part VII as an investment asset. Income received from an annuity that was purchased by an employer and in which the filer does not have ownership of the contract or the underlying assets should be reported in Part III as a form of deferred compensation.

Income received from a life insurance policy is not reported in Part III, but certain types are reported in Part VII.

Special attention will be given to the review of nomination and initial reports. The filer must report compensation, other than from the United States Government, in excess of $5,000 in any of the two calendar years prior to the calendar year during which a first report is filed.

B. Outside Employment and Honoraria

Special attention should be given to regulations relating to Outside Employment and Honoraria at Appendix III.

Covered Senior Employees

In accordance with the Ethics Reform Act of 1989, and the Judicial Conference regulations implementing this Act, covered senior employees, other than justices of the United States who retired from regular active service under Section 371(b) of title 28, United States Code; judges of the United States who retired from regular active service under Section 371(b) of title 28, United States Code and who have met the requirements of subsection (f) of Section 371(b) of title 28, United States Code, as certified in accordance with such subsection; and, justices and judges of the United States who retired from regular active service under Section 372(a) of title 28, United States Code, who receive compensation for teaching, are prohibited from:

- Receiving more than 15% of the pay rate for Executive Level II in earned income from outside employment if the officer or employee occupies a position classified above GS-15 of the General Schedule or, in the case of positions not under the General Schedule, for which the rate of basic pay is equal to or greater than 120 percent of the minimum rate of basic pay payable for GS-15 of the General Schedule and is not a career civil servant (See 5 U.S.C. § 5313 for the pay rate for Executive Level II). 5 U.S.C. app. § 501(a)(1). Those covered by the provisions of this Act for only a portion of a year, must pro-rate the 15% on the basis of the number of days the person will actually work in that calendar year. 5 U.S.C. app. § 501(a)(2).

- Being affiliated with or being employed by a firm, partnership, association, corporation, or other entity to provide professional services which involve a fiduciary relationship for compensation, serving for compensation as an officer or member of the board of any association, corporation, or other entity. 5 U.S.C. § 502.

- Receiving compensation for teaching without prior notification and approval from the appropriate official, if the officer or employee occupies a position classified above GS-15 of the General Schedule or, in the case of positions not under the General Schedule, for which the rate of basic pay is equal to or greater than 120 percent of the minimum rate of basic pay payable for GS-15 of the General Schedule and is not a career civil servant. See Section 5 of Appendix III for the procedures for requesting approval. 5 U.S.C. app. § 502.

NOTE: Covered senior employees are defined by Judicial Conference approved regulations as all judicial officers (except for part-time magistrate judges), commissioners and staff of the Sentencing Commission, the Director and Deputy Director of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts, and senior employees of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts serving at the pleasure of the Director (Schedule C status).

Judicial Officers and All Employees

In accordance with the Ethics Reform Act of 1989, and the Judicial Conference regulations implementing this Act, all judicial officers and all employees of the judicial branch are prohibited from accepting honoraria for any "appearance, speech, or article." Actual and necessary travel expenses incurred by the person and one relative are not deemed to constitute honoraria. 5 U.S.C. app. § 501(b).

- No judicial officer or employee of the judicial branch (except for part-time magistrate judges), may accept honoraria, but a payment may only be made on behalf of such officer or employee to a charitable organization in lieu of the honorarium, so long as the payment does not exceed $2,000, and is not made to a charitable organization from which the filer or the filer's parent, sibling, spouse, child, or dependent relative derives any financial benefit. 5 U.S.C. app. § 501(b) and (c). In such instances, the filer should report the source, date, and amount of payments made to charitable organizations in lieu of honoraria and shall simultaneously file with the Committee on Financial Disclosure, on a confidential basis, a corresponding list of recipients of all such payments together with their dates and amounts. Section 102(a)(1)(A).

C. General Provisions

For annual reports, the reporting period is the calendar year preceding the date of the report. Section 102(a)(1)(A). For initial and final reports, see Appendices I and II, respectively, for the appropriate reporting periods.

If neither you nor a spouse had any reportable income during the reporting period, check the "None" boxes rather than leaving Part III A or Part III B blank.

Commentary

Contained within these Instructions and Appendix III are detailed instructions and regulations relating to limitations imposed on certain judicial officers and employees with respect to certain types of outside employment and income. Several important guidelines need to be emphasized for the benefit of the reviewing official.

Covered senior employees (defined in the cited appendix) are prohibited from receiving more than 15% of the pay rate for Executive Level II ($158,100 during 2004) in earned income from outside employment. The limitation for 2004 is $23,715. However, senior judges who receive compensation for teaching, part-time magistrate judges, officers and employees of the Supreme Court, and employees of the Federal Judicial Center are exempted as to teaching income and are not restricted to this outside income limitation.

In addition, all judicial officers and all employees of the judicial branch (except for part-time magistrate judges) are prohibited from accepting honoraria for any "appearance, speech, or article." Any filer listing honoraria will be questioned for clarification and may eventually be referred to the Committee on Codes of Conduct for an advisory opinion.

Frequently, difficulty arises for the reviewing official and staff examiner concerning what constitutes outside earned income (which is attributed solely to the filer and not to the spouse). The following lists common examples of compensated activities which are subject to the calendar year income limitation, less the ordinary and necessary expenses paid or incurred in producing the income:

(1) teaching,
(2) serving as trustee of a family trust or executor of a family estate, and
(3) writing.

In addition, the following common examples do not constitute outside earned income and have no limitations imposed on the filer:

(1) pensions, annuities, and deferred compensation for services rendered prior to becoming a judicial officer or senior employee,
(2) investment funds,
(3) funds received from a family owned business,
(4) publication royalties, fees, and their functional equivalent, and
(5) compensation received by a senior judge for teaching.

Advisory Opinion Number 86, "Honoraria, Teaching, and Outside Earned Income Limitation," provides detailed interpretation on these issues and may serve as a helpful guideline. In addition, the following are summaries contained in Compendium, Sections 31-35 (2003), concerning recent advice given by the Committee on Codes of Conduct in response to confidential inquiries:

Outside Earned Income Limitation

(1) Where service as a family fiduciary involves work performed over several years but fee is paid in a single year, it is consistent with the statute and outside employment regulations for the judge, in applying the 15% cap, to allocate the amount of the fee over the several years in proportion to the work actually performed during each year. (Compendium § 33.1(a) (2003).)

(2) Flat fee of $250 received by judge from publisher (established user or purchaser of copyright and other forms of intellectual property) for writing a chapter in publisher's treatise is not excludable from the definition of outside earned income. The payment is a fixed and unconditional cash payment for a manuscript that is wholly unrelated to the sales or distribution of the ensuing publication. Thus, the fee is subject to the 15% cap. (Compendium § 33.2-5(a) (2003).)

(3) Where judge serves as editor-in-chief of a law journal and receives a royalty of 15% of the net cash receipts from the sale of the publication, the amount is considered a royalty and thus not subject to the 15% cap. (Compendium § 33.2-5(b) (2003).)

(4) Outside earned income is attributed solely to the actual earner regardless of community property laws. (Compendium § 33.3 (2003).)

Prohibition on Receipt Of Honoraria

(1) It would violate the statute and outside employment regulations for a law clerk to write an article for compensation during clerkship even though publication of the article and receipt of the honorarium would occur after the clerkship ends. (Compendium § 34(a) (2003).)

(2) Fee for performing wedding is not an honorarium. However, canons bar a judge from accepting additional compensation for performing judicial activities. (Compendium § 34.1(a) (2003).)

(3) Reimbursement of travel expenses (as defined in 5 U.S.C. app. § 505) for judge and one relative does not constitute an honorarium. (Compendium § 34.1(b) (2003).)

(4) Where a judge's paper to a continuing legal education program was later published and later still won $3000 cash award at sponsor's annual award program, the award is not a payment for the speech or article, and thus not an honorarium. An after-the-fact award based on merit for scholarly work, like the Nobel Prize, is an award in recognition of prior meritorious service and not in exchange therefor. (Compendium § 34.1(d) (2003).)

(5) Compensation for teaching a seminar for prospective law students and preparation of course materials does not constitute an honorarium. (Compendium § 34.1-2(d) (2003).)

(6) Fee received by judge as editor-in-chief of a law journal is not an honorarium, but rather compensation for writing more extensive than an article. (Compendium § 34.1-3(a) (2003).)

Limitations On Outside Employment

(1) Serving as a fiduciary of a family estate or trust as permitted by Canon 5D of the Code of Conduct for United States judges does not constitute practicing a profession involving a fiduciary relationship under this section. (Compendium § 35.3(a) (2003).)

(2) Service for compensation as editor-in-chief of a bankruptcy law journal is not the equivalent of being an officer or member of the board of an entity, and thus is not barred by this section. (Compendium § 35.4(a) (2003).)

(3) Although judge cannot receive compensation for service as family fiduciary where the trust directs the operating policy of the charity because that would be the functional equivalent of serving as an officer or member of the board of directors in violation of 5 U.S.C. app. § 502(4), where the judge serves as family fiduciary charged only with duties normally exercised by a family fiduciary, then 5 U.S.C. app. § 502(4) is inapplicable. Rather, § 502(3) applies, as does the family fiduciary exception. Thus, the judge may receive compensation subject to the 15% cap. (Compendium § 35.4(b) (2003).)

(4) A judge's status as partner of a family partnership or shareholder of a family corporation is not the equivalent of serving as officer or member of the board of an entity, and thus the financial return to the judge as partner or shareholder is not prohibited by 5 U.S.C. app. § 502(4). (Compendium § 35.4(c) (2003).)

(5) Where a judge failed to obtain prior approval of teaching, Chief Judge has authority to approve teaching for compensation nunc pro tunc if satisfied that the failure was occasioned by excusable neglect, the application would have been approved if timely filed, and other criteria for approval are satisfied. If circumstances do not justify nunc pro tunc approval, the judge's only recourse is to refund the compensation. (Compendium § 35.7(a) (2003).)

IV. Reimbursements

Information pertaining to the reporting person, spouse, and dependent children, as noted, is required in this part.

In this part, report information about reimbursements received by you, your spouse and dependent children, exclusive, however, of any items received by them totally independent of their relationship to you. Sections 102(a)(2)(A) and (C); and 102(e)(1)(C) and (D).

A reimbursement means any payment or other thing of value, other than gifts, to cover travel related expenses. Section 109(15).

For annual reports, the reporting period is the calendar year preceding the date of the report. Section 102(a)(2)(B). For initial and final reports, see Appendices I and II, respectively, for the appropriate reporting period.

In this part, provide:

the identity of the source and a brief description (including location, dates, and nature of expenses provided) of reimbursements received from any source aggregating $285 or more in value. Section 102(a)(2)(B).

You are not required to report in Part IV:

- food, lodging, or entertainment received from a relative. Section 102(a)(2)(A).
- food, lodging, or entertainment received as personal hospitality. Section 102(a)(2)(A).
- reimbursements received by your spouse and dependent children, independently of their relationship to you. Section 102(e)(1)(C) and (D).
- reimbursements received in a period when you were not an officer or employee of the federal government. Section 102(h).
- food, lodging, transportation, and entertainment provided by a foreign government within a foreign country or by the United States, the District of Columbia, or a state or local government or political subdivision thereof; food and beverages not consumed in connection with a gift of overnight lodging; Section 109(5).

- reimbursements provided by the United States, the District of Columbia, or a state or local government or political subdivision thereof; required to be reported under 5 U.S.C. § 7342; or required to be reported under 2 U.S.C. § 434. Section 109(15).

Relative means one who is related to the reporting person, as father, mother, son, daughter, brother, sister, uncle, aunt, great uncle, great aunt, first cousin, nephew, niece, husband, wife, grandfather, grandmother, grandson, granddaughter, father-in-law, mother-in-law, son-in-law, daughter-in-law, brother-in-law, sister-in-law, stepfather, stepmother, stepson, stepdaughter, stepbrother, stepsister, half brother, half sister, or who is the grandfather or grandmother of the spouse of the reporting person, and shall be deemed to include the fiance or fiancee of the reporting person. Section 109(16).

Personal hospitality means hospitality extended for a nonbusiness purpose by one, not a corporation or organization, at the personal residence of that person or his family or on property or facilities owned by that person or family. Section 109(14).

Beginning on January 1, 1991, in accordance with the Ethics Reform Act of 1989, and the Judicial Conference regulations implementing this Act, officers and employees are prohibited from soliciting or accepting anything of value from a person seeking official action from, doing business with, or whose interests would be substantially affected by, the performance or nonperformance of official duties. 5 U.S.C. § 7353. This prohibition applies to all reimbursements and gifts covered in Parts IV and V of the Financial Disclosure Report.

If you, your spouse, and your dependent children did not receive any reimbursements reportable in Part IV, check the "None" box rather than leaving Part IV blank.

IV. REIMBURSEMENTS

(Includes those to spouse and dependent children. See pp. 25-27 of Instructions.)

	SOURCE	DESCRIPTION
☐	NONE (No such reportable reimbursements)
1	Staley Foundation	June 15 - Haymarket, VA, Mtg of Board of Directors (Transportation, Meals, and Room)
2	FREE Foundation	Aug. 7-14 - Butte, MT - Environmental Seminar (Travel, Housing, Food, and Tuition)
3	VA CLE	Nov 7 - Williamsburg, VA - TAX CLE Seminar (Transportation, Food, and Hotel)

Notes to filer:

____ Do you, your spouse, or any dependent child have any reportable reimbursements or expense paid education or other trips? If not, is the NONE box checked?

____ Did you identify the source of the reimbursement, and provide a brief description including location, dates, and nature of expenses?

____ Can the reimbursement be accepted by you, your spouse, or dependent child?

Commentary

The following opinions issued by the Committee on Codes of Conduct provide guidance on issues associated with this part.

Attendance of judges and their spouses as guests at bar association dinners is proper, and a judge may accept reimbursement for the judge's or the judge's spouse's travel and hotel expenses to attend such a dinner sponsored by lawyer organizations even when the judge does not speak or render other services at the function. (Advisory Opinion No. 17.)

Although mere attendance (along with others similarly situated) without paying a registration fee would not create an appearance of impropriety, it would create an appearance of impropriety for employees of the Administrative Office to accept from a legal publishing firm a gift of transportation, lodging and meals in connection with a professional training program sponsored by the firm. (Compendium § 2.9(b) (2003).)

A judge participating as a faculty member in a two-week seminar of general interest organized on a nonprofit basis and financed by tuition and subsistence payments by nonfaculty attendees may accept reimbursement for the judge's and the judge's spouse's travel and subsistence expenses. (Advisory Opinion No. 3.)

A judicial employee may receive compensation and reimbursement of expenses for outside activities provided that receipt of such compensation and reimbursement is not prohibited or restricted by this Code, the Ethics Reform Act, and other applicable law, and provided that the source or amount of such payments does not influence or give the appearance of influencing the judicial employee in the performance of official duties or otherwise give the appearance of impropriety. Expense reimbursement should be limited to the actual cost of travel, food and lodging reasonably incurred by a judicial employee and, where appropriate to the occasion, by the judicial employee's spouse or relative. Any payment in excess of such an amount is compensation. (Code of Conduct for Judicial Employees, Canon 4E.)

V. Gifts

Information pertaining to the reporting person, spouse, and dependent children, as noted, is required in this part.

In this part, report information about gifts other than transportation (or lodging, food or entertainment in connection with transportation that is furnished or reimbursed), aggregating $285 or more in value received by you, your spouse and dependent children from any source other than a relative during the preceding calendar year. A gift of lodging or entertainment not incident to travel which exceeds $285 must be reported in this part. Gifts from separate sources with a fair market value of $114 or less need not be aggregated to determine if the $285 reporting threshold has been met. Section 102(a)(2)(A).

A gift is a payment, advance, forbearance, rendering, or deposit of money, or anything of value, unless consideration of equal or greater value is received by the donor. Section 109(5).

If you have been extended an honorary membership in an organization and you avail yourself of the privileges, rights, etc., to a substantial degree, and the dues are in excess of $285 a year, you must report the honorary membership in this part.

You are not required to disclose information about:

- gifts received from a relative. Section 102(a)(2)(A).
- gifts received by a spouse and dependent children, totally independent of their relationship to you. Section 102(e)(1)(C).
- gifts received in a period when you were not an officer or employee of the federal government. Section 102(h).
- gifts that are bequests and other forms of inheritance. Section 109(5)(A).
- communications to the offices of a reporting person, including subscriptions to newspapers and periodicals. Section 109(5)(E).
- suitable mementos of a function honoring the reporting person. Section 109(5)(B).

If you, your spouse, and your dependent children did not receive any gifts reportable in Part V, check the "None" box rather than leaving Part V blank.

For the definition of relative, refer to Part IV of these instructions.

For annual reports, the reporting period is the calendar year preceding the date of the report. Section 102(a)(2)(A). For initial and final reports, see Appendices I and II, respectively, for the appropriate reporting period and rules.

V. GIFTS. (Includes those to spouse and dependent children. See pp.28-31 of Instructions.)

☐ NONE (No such reportable gifts)

1	Clyde Monet	Tickets to World Cup games	$ 325.00
2	The Executive Club	Honorary Membership (dues, like privileges)	$ 1200.00
3			$

Notes to filer:

___ Do you, your spouse, or any dependent child have any reportable gifts other than transportation, lodging, food, or entertainment? If not, is the NONE box checked?

___ Did you list the identity of the source, a description of the gift, and the actual dollar value?

___ Can the gift be accepted?

Commentary

If stock is listed as a gift, the stock should also be reported in Part VII, Investments and Trusts.

The value of a gift is shown by a dollar amount, not by a value code.

If the gift is from an individual, the individual must be specifically named. It is not acceptable to identify the source of the gift as "boyfriend," "girlfriend," "friend," or "significant other."

The following opinions issued by the Committee on Codes of Conduct provide guidance on issues associated with this part.

Investitures and Similar Ceremonies

(a) It is permissible for a judge to accept a gavel and a $500 gift from a former client on the occasion of the judge's investiture. (Compendium § 5.4-2(a) (2003).)

(b) It is permissible for a judge to accept a gavel and a contribution toward the cost of the reception from a local bar association on the occasion of the judge's investiture. (Compendium § 5.4-2(b) (2003).)

(c) It is permissible for a judge to accept leather notebook and pen from Law Institute as a memento of a judge's presentation. (Compendium § 5.4-2(c) (2003).)

(d) It is permissible for a judge to be the guest of honor at a public dinner arranged by former law clerks, attended by lawyers and other members of the public, as well as the law clerks. The law clerks should make clear on the invitations and other papers relating to the dinner, not only the fact that the dinner is sponsored solely by present and former law clerks, but that the amount paid by other attendees is solely to cover the cost of the dinner, that no fund-raising activity is involved, and that no part of the amount paid for the dinner will be employed in the purchase of a gift for the honoree. (Compendium § 5.4-5(c) (2003).)

Gifts on Special Occasions

(a) A judge may accept a gift of a trip aboard a cruising ship (costing about $1500) on the occasion of 20th anniversary as a United States judge where the donees consist exclusively of persons who have worked directly with the judge (i.e., law clerks, secretaries, courtroom deputies, and court reporters), there are a sufficient number of donees that no individual contribution to the gift is unusually large, and the judge is not made aware of the amounts contributed by the respective donees. (Compendium § 5.4-7(a) (2003).)

(b) On occasion of taking senior status, judge may accept gift from law clerks of golfing trip. (Compendium § 5.4-7(b) (2003).)

(c) No impropriety for former law clerks to solicit from other law clerks to establish scholarship in honor of retiring judge. The Judge and present law clerks should not solicit. (Compendium § 5.4-7(c) (2003).)

(d) It would create an appearance of impropriety for a judge to permit a for-profit company to host a reception following the judge's investiture, where the judge had no pre-existing relationship with the company, would not otherwise have been required to recuse, and the circumstances would convey the impression that the company was in a special position to influence the judge. (Canon 2B and Compendium § 2.10(c) (2003).)

Miscellaneous Gift Rulings

(a) It is permissible to accept books from West Publishing Company for official use. (Compendium § 5.4-Z(a) (2003).)

(b) It is permissible for a judge's children to accept scholarships awarded on the same terms and based on the same criteria applied to other applicants. (Compendium § 5.4-Z(b) (2003).)

(c) Gifts from a friend not prohibited where friend not likely to ever appear in judge's court. (Compendium § 5.4-Z(c) (2003).)

(d) It is permissible for a judge to attend, and accept hospitality at bar association events and meetings of other organizations devoted to improvement of the law, legal system, or the administration of justice. With respect to attendance at cocktail parties hosted by law firms in connection with bar meetings, judicial conferences, and the like, there is no impropriety in a judge accepting such invitations in the absence of reason to believe that such attendance will reasonably reflect unfavorably on the judge's impartiality or is likely to be exploited by the law firm. (Advisory Opinion No. 17.)

(e) It is permissible for judges to attend bar association events such as receptions where a legal publishing firm has donated the hors d'oeuvres and beverages to the bar association. It is not appropriate, however, for a group of judges or judicial personnel to allow a legal publishing firm or other vendor doing business with their court to donate food and beverages for a meeting of the judges or judicial employees. (Compendium § 2.9(a) (2003).)

Honorary/Reduced-Rate Memberships

(a) It is permissible for a judge to accept a free membership in a country club, including a waiver or reduction in the initiation fee, or to accept a free or reduced membership in a YMCA if it is customary in that community, similar privileges are extended to other public officials, the interests of the organizations have not and are not likely to come before the judge, and the judge is satisfied that the membership is not being used by the organization to promote its endeavors. (See Advisory Opinion No. 47.)

(b) It is permissible for a judge to accept a free membership in the "American Board of Trial Advocates," the organization being devoted to the improvement of the law. (Compendium § 5.4-1(b) (2003).)

(c) It is permissible to accept free membership in a local bar association. (Compendium § 5.4-1(c) (2003).)

VI. Liabilities

Information pertaining to the reporting person, spouse, and dependent children is required in this part.

In this part, list all of your, your spouse's and dependent children's liabilities to any creditor other than a spouse, parent, brother, sister, or child, which exceeded $10,000 at any time during the reporting period. Sections 102(a)(4) and 102(e)(1)(E).

For annual reports, the reporting period is the calendar year preceding the date of the report. Section 102(a)(4). For initial and final reports, see Appendices I and II, respectively, for the appropriate reporting periods.

In this part, list the identity and category of value of each liability. The identity includes the name of the creditor and a description of the liability. Section 102(a)(4). To assist the reviewer, liabilities should be listed in the same order as in the previous report.

The category codes for the amount owed as of the end of the reporting period are shown on the report and are as follows:

J -	$15,000 or less	P1 -	$1,000,001 to $5,000,000
K -	$15,001 to $50,000	P2 -	$5,000,001 to $25,000,000
L -	$50,001 to $100,000	P3 -	$25,000,001 to $50,000,000
M -	$100,001 to $250,000	P4 -	more than $50,000,000
N -	$250,001 to $500,000
O -	$500,001 to $1,000,000

Section 102(d)(1).

The reporting requirement relates to obligations that at any time during the reporting period exceeded $10,000, but the amount to be shown by the category code is the amount owed as of the end of the reporting period.

You are not required to report:

- any liability owed to a spouse, parent, brother, sister, or child. Section 102(a)(4).
- any mortgage, home equity loan, or line of credit secured by real property which is a personal residence of you or your spouse. Section 102(a)(4)(A).
- any loan secured by a personal motor vehicle, household furniture, or appliances that does not exceed the purchase price of the item securing the liability. Section 102(a)(4)(B).

- any information with respect to a spouse living separate and apart from you with the intention of terminating the marriage or providing for permanent separation or with respect to any income or obligations arising from the dissolution of the marriage or permanent separation. Section 102(e)(2).

- any revolving charge account whose balance did not exceed $10,000 as of the close of the preceding calendar year.

- political campaign funds, including campaign receipts and expenditures. Section 102(g).

- any liability which is the sole liability or responsibility of the spouse or child; which is not derived from the assets, income or activities of the reporting person; from which the reporting person does not derive or expect to derive a benefit; and of which the reporting person has no knowledge. Section 102(e)(1)(E). Omission of such data indicates a certification of these statutory conditions. This rule also applies to the reporting of investments and trusts, see the Instructions for Part VII.

If you, your spouse, and dependent children did not have any reportable liabilities, check the "None" box rather than leaving Part VI blank.

VII. Investments and Trusts

Information pertaining to the reporting person, spouse, and dependent children is required in this part.

1. General

In this part, a complete listing is required of reportable assets owned by the reporting person, spouse, and dependent children. Each asset must be individually listed and identified except as may be specifically provided otherwise (see Part 7B Trusts, page 58). Bank or brokerage house reports are not acceptable for compliance with these reporting requirements unless they succinctly contain all necessary information without requiring the reader to perform calculations or select out necessary data from a larger body of information. The use of bank or brokerage house statements as an alternative form of filing must have the advance approval of the Committee in accordance with page 6 of the filing instructions. Any request should be made sufficiently in advance of the filing deadline to permit careful consideration and discussion with the reporting person.

Report assets held during the preceding calendar year in a trade or business, or for investment or the production of income, which have a fair market value in excess of $1,000 at the end of the year or from which you received income in excess of $200 during the preceding calendar year. Sections 102(a)(3) and 102(a)(1)(B).

You are not required to report:

- Investments in the Thrift Savings Plan. Section 102(i)(1)(A).

- Any property, real or personal, not held in a trade or business, or for investment or the production of income. As examples, you need not report a private residence or personal automobiles. Section 102(a)(3).

- Any personal liability owed to you, your spouse, or dependent children by a spouse, or by a parent, brother, sister, or child of you or your spouse. Sections 102(a)(3) and 102(e)(1).

- Accounts in a financial institution (any form of deposit in a bank, savings and loan association, credit union, or similar financial institution), unless the aggregate amount of income for all an individual's income producing accounts at the institution for the reporting year is in excess of $200, or the aggregate value at the end of the reporting year of all such income producing accounts is more than $5,000. If either condition is met, the name of the financial institution, the amount of income, and the value of the accounts must be disclosed. Sections 102(a)(1)(B) and 102(a)(3).

- Asset information with respect to a spouse living separate and apart with the intention of terminating the marriage or providing for permanent separation. Section 102(e)(2).

- Political campaign funds, including campaign receipts and expenditures. Section 102(g).

- In Part VII, information associated with property which is the sole financial interest or responsibility of the spouse or child; which is not derived from the assets, income or activities of the reporting person; from which the reporting person does not derive or expect to derive a benefit; and of which the reporting person has no knowledge. Section 102(e)(1)(E). Omission of such data indicates a certification of these statutory conditions. This rule also applies to the reporting of liabilities, see the Instructions for Part VI.

To help reporting persons in instances where a position held in an economic entity may have a bearing on reporting requirements, the following should be used as guidance:

When a Financial Disclosure Report contains information reflecting a filer's interest in a partnership or other business enterprise, the filer must disclose the assets held by the business entity if a filer can direct, influence or in any other manner affect the purchase, exchange, sale or disposition of the entity or property owned by the entity, or when the filer can influence policy decisions which affect the purchase, exchange, sale or disposition of the entity or of property which it owns.

For annual reports, the reporting period is the calendar year preceding the date of the report. Section 102(a)(1)(B). For initial and final reports, see Appendices I and II, respectively, for the appropriate period.

If you, your spouse, and dependent children did not have assets subject to reporting, check the "None" box rather than leaving Part VII blank.

Commentary

Filers should compare the list of assets in Part VII from their prior report and their current report and ensure that an explanation is provided for every asset that does not appear on both reports. In most cases, this explanation would be the reporting of a transaction in Column D. In other cases, a parenthetical "(X)" in Column A or a note in Part VIII would be appropriate. See pages 39-42, 52, and 61 for detailed instructions and examples on these matters.

Investment income is to be contrasted with earned income. The crucial factor is the filer's services. If the filer's services are a material factor in the production of income, it is earned income and should be reported in Part III. However, limited partners usually receive investment income from the partnership, since they normally do not perform services for the partnership. Investment income includes returns on investments rather than compensation for personal services. It includes income derived from all forms of property, such as securities, funds, accounts, real estate, partnerships, joint ventures, businesses, and interests in trusts and estates.

An investment asset must be reported if either the income or value threshold is met:

a) If the interest-bearing deposit accounts (savings, checking, or money market) in a bank or similar financial institution (credit union, savings & loan) produced more than $200 in income or had a value greater than $5,000, the name of the financial institution, the amount of income, and the value of the accounts must be disclosed;

b) If any other asset (stocks, bonds, mutual funds, real estate) produced more than $200 in income or had a value greater than $1,000, the asset, its income, and its value must be disclosed.

Normally, any information pertaining to a personal residence is exempted from reporting. However, a second personal residence (e.g., a weekend or vacation home) should be reported if rental income is received for the use of the property.

The reporting of accounts in a financial institution does require some clarification. If the aggregate amount of income for all of an individual's accounts or the value of all such income producing accounts exceeds the established thresholds, then the aggregate totals for all accounts in that institution should be reported. It is important to apply the "threshold test" separately to each individual owner of the accounts, which would include the following:

(1) accounts individually owned by filer,

(2) accounts individually owned by spouse,

(3) accounts individually owned by dependent child, and

(4) accounts jointly owned by filer and spouse or dependent child.

It should be understood that a reporting exemption for failure to meet a threshold amount, or for any other reason, does not affect any inquiry or recusal obligation under the Code of Conduct for United States Judges.

2. Description of Assets

In completing Part VII, a separate description of each asset listed is required. To assist the reviewer, assets should be listed in the same order as in the previous report. Each asset reported should be described in sufficient detail so the reader can tell what the property is. As examples:

- For stocks, bonds, and other securities indicate the type of the holding, "common," etc., and its name. Commonly understood abbreviations are permitted such as stock ticker symbols (e.g., "JNJ" for "Johnson & Johnson") or trademarked names (e.g., "GE" for "General Electric" or "GM" for "General Motors").

- For a cash equivalent account (savings, interest checking, money market, CDs) within a bank, credit union, savings and loan, or similar financial institution (distinguished from accounts invested in stocks and bonds) valued at or aggregating over $5,000, list the name of the institution (e.g., Bank of America or Federal Courts Savings and Loan) followed by "Account" (or "Accounts," if there is more than one account). Do not list account numbers or addresses for a financial institution or its branches. You need not indicate the precise type of cash equivalent account (e.g., "checking," "savings," "N.O.W."). Information for all cash equivalent accounts at each institution may be aggregated.

- For a brokerage account or stock management account with a financial management company, a bank, or similar financial institution it is not necessary to list the name of the financial management company, bank, or similar financial institution. You must list the individual stocks, the full name of a mutual fund or money market fund, bonds, or other assets in the account. If you desire to list the account identification in a header for ease of reporting, you should list only the name of the institution and not the address or account number, e.g., SunTrust Bank Brokerage Account. For security reasons, you may list the account only as Brokerage Account #1 or Brokerage Account #2.

- For notes or accounts receivable, indicate the nature of the receivable and the name of the debtor(s).

- For each real estate interest, indicate the general geographic location, such as city or county and state. If more than one parcel of real estate is owned in the same geographic area, you may identify each parcel by number, i.e., Parcel 1, 2, 3, etc., rather than identifying each parcel by street address, lot, or block number.

- For an interest in a trust, indicate the nature of the interest (e.g., "income beneficiary") and the name (if appropriate) of the trust.

- For an interest in a mutual fund or pooled or common trust fund administered by an independent financial or brokerage institution, furnish the name of the specific fund (e.g., Kemper-Dreman Financial Services Fund B).

- For each royalty or other mineral interest (including oil and gas):

  (a) Royalty interest in minerals - an interest in minerals in a particular parcel of real property (whether or not the filer owns the surface rights), and regardless of whether minerals are currently being produced, should be reported as a real property interest - the description in Part VII, Column A, should indicate "Mineral Interest" or "Royalty Interest" and indicate the city or county and state in which the property is located. For example: "Royalty Interest, Clay County, Kansas."

  (b) Investor interest in mineral production enterprise - an investment in a mineral production enterprise for a percentage interest in the profits should be described in Part VII, Column A by listing the name of the enterprise and the location of the business, but not the locations of wells. For example: "ABC Joint Venture - Oklahoma City, OK." The income description in Column B(2) may be "Royalty" (if the filer receives a fixed payment for each barrel, ton, or other unit of production) or "distribution" (if the filer receives a share of the profits).

  (c) Working interest in minerals - a participation in the drilling enterprise in minerals owned by the filer (where the filer has elected to take a share of production profits rather than a royalty payment) should be listed in Part VII, Column A as "working interest" with the name of the well or mine, and the county and state in which it is located. For example: "Working Interest - Clay #1, Sand County, MO." The income description in Column B(2) should be "royalty."

- An interest in the investment value of an annuity should be reported in Part VII, whether or not contributions are continuing to be made.

- Life insurance policies are issued in two basic varieties: "term" and "cash value" insurance.

  Term insurance pays a benefit if the insured person dies during the term of the policy and when the policy expires, no value remains. As the insured person does not have an ownership interest in the value of the policy, term insurance is not reportable in Part VII.

  Cash value insurance is part insurance and part investment. Such policies require premiums during the life of the insured person in exchange for a fixed sum of money to a beneficiary when the insured person dies. A part of the premiums pays for the expense of the insurance portion of the policy, and the remainder goes into a tax-deferred cash reserve which is invested and builds the policy's cash value. An insured person would have an ownership interest in the investment portion of such a policy that would be reported in Part VII. The filer would have no control over the assets of a "whole life" or "universal life" policy. For these types of policies, the filer should report in Column A the name of the insurance company and the type, for example, "Prudential Whole Life" or "Metlife: Universal Variable."

Generally, the purchaser of an insurance policy does not select specific investment funds other than a general category of risk, e.g., high, medium, or low-risk. Under a "variable" or "universal variable" policy that allows the insured person to choose specific investments from options offered by the insurer, the filer should report in Column A the name of the insurance company and the fund that he or she has selected, for example, "Prudential Variable Life: Prudential Money Market Fund." If assets were allocated to more than one fund, all funds to which investments were allocated should be reported.

At times, reporting persons inadvertently omit the listing of assets, and correct the previous year's errors in the following year's report. Also, assets which were reported in one year may fail a qualifying requirement (such as a value of $1,000) in the following year and thus are not reported. When this occurs, put an explanatory item in Part VII or in Part VIII, with a reference in Part VII to avoid a letter of inquiry (see the example on page 61).

In addition, identify with a parenthetical "(X)" assets which have been previously exempt from disclosure and now are reportable. The parenthetical "(X)" should also be used to identify an asset that meets the reporting threshold and is otherwise exempt from the reporting requirements for gift under Part V. This should preclude a letter of inquiry from the Committee.

Notes to Filer:

____ Do you identify the asset in Column A in sufficient detail to clearly identify the type of property? If no assets are listed, is the NONE box checked?

____ If a real estate interest is listed, is the city or county and state listed?

____ If a financial institution is listed, is the institution clearly identified?

____ If a note or account receivable is listed, are the debtor names and the nature of the debt described?

____ If a gas, oil, or mineral interest is listed, do you identify the city or county and state and the name of the energy company or other payor of royalties, working interests, or rentals?

____ Do you clearly identify stocks, bonds, mutual funds and the underlying assets of IRAs and brokerage accounts?

____ If the asset was not listed on the previous report, do you include transactional information in Column D or a parenthetical "(X)" in Column A denoting that the asset was exempt from disclosure on the previous report?

____ If you listed a position in Part I as trustee, administrator, custodian, etc., is the estate or trust listed and the assets therein properly identified?

Commentary

When listing stocks, bonds, and other securities, the individual name or commonly understood abbreviation should be provided. Stocks should be indicated as "common" or "preferred." Bonds and other securities should have enough detail in the description to differentiate that asset from other similar assets listed. This is particularly helpful for the reviewer and examiner when the filer reports multiple bonds or securities in the same or similar series, or brokerage accounts that list accounts in the name of the firm.

When reporting accounts with financial institutions, the type of account does not need to be listed.

When reporting an interest in a mutual fund or common trust fund, the name of the specific fund is required, e.g., Kemper-Dreman Financial Services Fund B. There is no requirement to list the individual assets. An interest in a trust, estate, or similar entity requires the listing of each individual asset unless the exemptions from disclosure of the individual assets in paragraph 7B. Trusts are met.

The reviewer and examiner will note when an asset appears on the current report and is not listed on the prior report and there is no transaction information in Column D. In this situation, the filer should place a parenthetical "(X)" in Column A denoting that the asset was exempt from disclosure in the prior report.

It is important to recognize that in almost every instance where a filer is a trustee, executor, administrator, custodian etc., the filer has the legal authority and responsibility to exercise control over and manage the assets in a trust or estate. It is this authority based on the filer's fiduciary responsibilities to control the purchase, sale, or other disposition of the assets that requires the filer to list the assets in this part.

Filers should take special care when disclosing an IRA. They are merely arrangements for holding other investments on a tax-deferred basis. The focus should be placed on the underlying investments which should be disclosed:

- Many IRAs are invested in cash-equivalent accounts, such as a money market account, certificate of deposit, or other deposit account in a bank, credit union, or savings and loan. No further information about these accounts is required to be disclosed. In this regard, see line 3 of the example on page 46.

- However, IRA accounts are also offered by brokers and investment firms for investment in stocks and bonds. If the IRA account contains any other type of entity, such as mutual funds, stocks, or bonds, the filer must disclose the underlying holdings in the account. In this regard, see lines 5-8 of the example on page 57.

The next question is the authority to select investment assets that will be bought or sold by the plan:

- If the filer can select the assets that will be purchased or sold (beyond merely select a risk category, e.g., high, medium, or low), the plan is considered "self-directed," and every asset in excess of $1,000 in value or which pays more than $200 in income must be reported. NOTE: So long as the filer has the power to choose investment assets - even if he or she generally defers to the decisions of an investment manager - the individual assets must be listed.

- If the filer does not control the selection of assets (or can only choose a general category of risk, e.g., low, medium, or high), the filer needs to report in Column A only the specific name of the fund and not the underlying assets. As described in later sections, the information required in Columns B, C, and D will relate to the fund as a whole, and not the individual assets held by that fund. Assets held in tax-deferred retirement or pension accounts, including 401(k), 403(b), and SEP (Simplified Employee Pension) Plans maintained and controlled by a former employer, e.g., a former law firm, TIAA-CREF, state and county governments, and other similar entities are not considered self-directed by the individual and qualify as "common trust funds." In addition, tax-deferred investment products from insurance companies, e.g., annuities, are also not considered self-directed. Therefore, the filer is not required to provide any details about the individual assets held by those plans, but is only required to list the name of the specific plan in Column A.

3. Income

In Column B of Part VII, the income from listed assets must be shown. The disclosure of the gross amount and the type of income -- dividends, rent, interest, or income from discharge of indebtedness -- is required. Sections 102(a)(1)(B) and 109(7). All income is reportable, whether taxable, tax deferred, or tax exempt. When no income is received (or there is a loss) Column B1 under Amount should be left blank and the word "NONE" should appear in Column B2 under Type. When some income is received, the appropriate code, reflecting the amount, should be used. The ranges are required by statute and the coded amounts for income are listed on the reporting form as follows:

A - $1,000 or less
B - $1,001 to $2,500
C - $2,501 to $5,000
D - $5,001 to $15,000
E - $15,001 to $50,000
F - $50,001 to $100,000
G - $100,001 to $1,000,000
H1 - $1,000,001 to $5,000,000
H2 - More than $5,000,000
Section 102(a)(1)(B).

The same ranges and codes are used to report capital gains associated with transactions in Column D of Part VII. However, capital gains associated with "distributions" should be treated and reported as dividends in Column B.

The income from U.S. Savings Bonds, and similar investments should be reported if the minimum of $200 is reached.

Regular, periodic payments of an annuity are treated as a return of the filer's investment and are, therefore, not reported as income. A filer need not report in Column B income received by the investments underlying an annuity which pays a fixed amount, and the filer should enter "NONE" in Column B(2) for such annuities. However, if the amount payable is variable according to returns on investment, the filer should report in Column B the amount credited to his or her annuity contract.

Dividends or interest received in the investment component of a cash value life insurance policy (whole life, universal life, variable life, or universal variable life), whether used to reduce premiums paid or to increase the amount of coverage, should be reported in Column B.

Column B must be completed even if an asset is entirely sold during the reporting period. If no income was received, enter "NONE" in Column B(2).

Notes to filer:

____ Do you disclose in Column B the amount and type of income?

____ If you indicate "NONE" in Column B(2), did you leave Column B(1) blank?

Commentary

Column B(1), the income amount code, and Column B(2), the type of income, should both be completed if you have income. If no income was received, Column B(1) should be left blank and the word "None" should appear in Column B(2). When some income is received, then the appropriate income amount code and type should be provided.

Some filers question whether to report income from IRAs (Individual Retirement Account) or other retirement or pension plans where they are not actually drawing income from the account. All income should be reported, whether taxable, tax deferred, or tax exempt. For any mutual fund, IRA, pension fund, or other pooled investment plan, filers should report in Column B any dividend, interest, or capital gain income that is earned by the fund and credited to the filer's account. This type of income is generally reported on the Form 1099-Div that is issued for income tax purposes. Certain retirement and investment funds do not credit income to the individual accounts but instead report a "unit value" to participants. If no income is reported as having been credited to the filer's account, leave Column B(1) blank and enter "NONE" in Column B(2). Filers are not required to disclose as income any increase or decrease in the value of their account resulting solely from the change in market value of assets, even though these values are commonly highlighted in reports to investors. The market value of assets is reflected in the entries in Column C.

4. Value

In Column C, the gross value of the asset at the end of the reporting period is reported. Section 102(a)(3). Accordingly, if an asset is entirely sold before the end of the reporting period, Column C should be left blank. The statutory value ranges and a value code for each range are listed on the bottom of the form. These same values are used for the value of reported assets in Column C and for the value of assets reported in the transaction part of Part VII, Column D. They are as follows:

J - $15,000 or less	O - $500,001 to $1,000,000
K - $15,001 to $50,000	P1 - $1,000,001 to $ 5,000,000
L - $50,001 to $100,000	P2 - $5,000,001 to $25,000,000
M - $100,001 to $250,000	P3 - $25,000,001 to $50,000,000
N - $250,001 to $500,000	P4 - More than $50,000,000

Section 102(d)(1).

In addition, the method used for valuation should be reported in Column C. These are coded as follows:

Q Appraisal. Indicate in Part VII-A or Part VIII the date of the appraisal.

R Cost. This method may be used only for real property or an interest in a real estate partnership. If used, show in Part VII-A or Part VIII the date of purchase and the amount, not just the category code, of the purchase price.

S Assessment -- assessed value for tax purposes. If this method is used, show in Part VII-A or Part VIII the amount, not just the category code, of the assessed value and, if the property is assessed at less than 100% of its value, adjust the assessed value to reflect the current value and explain your adjustment.

T Cash/Market. The quoted market price of publicly traded stocks and other securities; the face value of interest bearing corporate or municipal bonds or comparable securities; the balance or surrender value of certificates of deposit, savings and checking accounts, money market funds, etc.

U Book. The net worth of a proprietorship, partnership interest, or corporate stock according to the books of such entity. This method may be used only for property interests not publicly traded.

V Other. Any other recognized indication of value, such as current selling price of a comparable interest. If this method is used, you must describe in Part VII-A or Part VIII the method used.

DOJ_NMG_0143009

W Estimated. Your good faith estimate of the value of property if its exact value is not known and a more accurate determination of its value cannot be easily obtained by another method.

The gross value of the property should be indicated without reductions for mortgages, etc. References may be made in Part VII to mortgages included in Part VI (Liabilities).

The value of the investment component of a cash value life insurance policy should be reported in Column C. Do not report the "face value" or value of the death benefit under the policy.

Notes to Filer:

____ Do you list in Column C(1) the gross value code (J-P) at the end of the reporting period?

____ Do you list in Column C(2) the correct value method code (Q-W) reflecting how the value of the asset was determined?

____ If you used value method codes "Q," "R," "S," or "V," did you include the appropriate information in Column A or Part VIII?

Commentary

If an asset is entirely sold during the reporting period, then Column C should be left blank. However, if an asset is partially sold (such as a portion of the total shares of stock owned), then Column C should be completed.

In addition, it should be emphasized that in Column C(2), there are four value method codes which require additional information in either Column A or Part VIII. Filers tend to forget that each report must stand on its own and as a result often fail to provide the following on their report each year:

(1) "Q" - Appraisal - the date of the appraisal.

(2) "R" - Cost - the date of purchase and the dollar amount of the purchase price.

(3) "S" - Assessment - the dollar amount of the assessed value.

(4) "V" - Other - the filer must describe the method used in Column A (Description) or Part VIII.

5. Transactions

Information on transactions should be entered in Column D. Transactions to be reported involve any purchase, sale or exchange during the reporting period which exceeds $1,000. Section 102(a)(5).

As to each acquisition or disposition, you should disclose:

a) the type of transaction, e.g., buy, sell, redeem, etc.;

b) the date of the transaction;

c) the value category code indicating the value of the consideration paid or received (codes J-P);

d) the capital gain, if exceeding $200, realized on a disposition, using the appropriate income category code (codes A-H);

e) the identity of the buyer or seller unless the transaction was conducted through public trading, as on a stock or commodities exchange;

f) the liquidation of a bank account or money market fund that may have been reported on a prior report.

If an asset has been bought and sold during the same reporting period, provide the required information about both transactions on successive lines (see example on page 53, lines 6 and 7).

In most corporate mergers and reorganizations, shareholders play a passive role and realize no taxable capital gains. Accordingly, where a non-taxable corporate reorganization results in the listing of a new asset or the omission of an asset disclosed on the previous report with no purchase or sale by the filer, the change of name should be explained with a note in Column A or in Part VIII, as appropriate. For example, if the filer listed the "ABC Company" on a previous report and it has since been merged into the "XYZ Company," the filer should list "XYZ Co. (formerly ABC Co.)" in Column A. Only if the filer is required to report a capital gain for income tax purposes would a merger be treated as a transaction. Also, if the filer sells the shares of the new corporation after the merger, that transaction must be reported.

Income received pursuant to an annuity contract owned by the filer (or filer's spouse) need not be reported as a transaction in Column D. Similarly, the withdrawal of a portion of the investment component of a life insurance policy need not be reported as a transaction in Column D, but a cancellation or withdrawal of the entire balance so as to end the policy should be reported as "cancel," "withdrawal," or "sale."

The value category codes, codes J-P, which for convenient reference are also shown at the bottom of the report, are listed above under VALUE.

The income category codes, codes A-H, for reporting capital gains, which for convenient reference are also shown at the bottom of the report, are listed above under INCOME. If there is a loss, or no gain or loss, Column D4 under GAIN should be left blank.

You are not required to report:

- transactions solely between yourself, your spouse, and your dependent children; Section 102(a)(5);
- transactions in which the then fair market value of consideration paid or received did not exceed $1,000; Section 102(a)(5);
- transactions involving property used solely as the personal residence of you or your spouse; Section 102(a)(5)(A);
- transactions involving a mere change of form of assets, e.g., a stock split;
- transactions involving deposits or withdrawals from bank accounts and money market funds other than the opening or closing of such accounts;
- transactions involving the reinvestment of dividends, interest, and capital gain distributions;
- inheritances received by the filer or the filer's spouse or dependent children; or
- gifts made to a charity or to a non-dependent relative by the filer or the filer's spouse or dependent children.

However, if a transaction not reported under these exceptions would result in an asset being added to or removed from the list of assets in Part VII:

a) for the opening or closing of a bank account with a transaction involving less than $1,000, insert "Opened" or "Closed" in Column D(1) and leave Columns D(2) through D(5) blank;

b) for an asset acquired through an exempt transaction (such as an inheritance or exempt gift), insert "(X)" after the asset description in Column A; and

c) for an asset disposed of through an exempt transaction, insert "donated" in Column D(1) and leave Columns D(2) through D(5) blank or include an explanatory note in Part VIII to avoid an inquiry about the change in the list of assets.

Please ensure that the entries in Columns C and D are consistent:

- If property is entirely disposed of during the reporting year, Column C should be left blank;

- If property is partially disposed of during the reporting year, Column C should be completed and Column D(1) should include "Part" (e.g., "Part sold" or "Part redeemed").

6. Widely Held Investment Funds

A fund is a widely held investment fund if it:

is publicly traded or the assets of the fund are widely diversified, and the reporting person neither exercises control, nor has the ability to exercise control over the financial interests held by the fund. Section 102(f)(8).

A reporting person must report holdings in widely held investment funds. The reporting person must report the income from the fund, the end of period value, and transactions with regard to the fund. The reporting person is not required to report the individual assets owned by the fund, or the transactions engaged in by the fund. Rather, the fund itself, is considered to be the source of the income obtained therefrom, even though that income includes dividends, interest on capital gains earned with respect to stocks, bonds, etc., held by the fund. Accordingly, a reporting person would report a widely held fund as follows:

7. Aggregate Ownership Arrangements – Trusts, IRAs, and Investment Clubs

A. Aggregate Reporting

The Committee has established special rules for reporting assets held in an ownership arrangement which is separate from the reporting person himself or herself, referred to herein as an "Aggregate Ownership Arrangement." A personal stock account with a brokerage is not considered an Aggregate Ownership Arrangement. As discussed below, a reporting person will have to identify each separate asset held in the Aggregate Ownership Arrangement and report transactions regarding each asset. However, the reporting person can report the aggregate (total) income and end of period value of the asset and need[1] not provide the separate income and end of period value of each separate asset therein.

The basic rule is that the income, value, and transactions of the holdings of any Aggregate Ownership Arrangement in which the reporting person, spouse, or dependent child has a beneficial interest must be reported if the arrangement itself had ownership of any asset having a value of $1,000 at the end of the reporting period, regardless of the value of the reporting person, spouse, or dependent child's individual share. Thus, there must be a list of each asset owned by the Aggregate Ownership Arrangement having a value in excess of $1,000 or affected by any transaction in excess of $1,000.

As to each Aggregate Ownership Arrangement, the reporting person shall provide, on a line in Part VII, the following:

(1) The identity of the Aggregate Ownership Arrangement in Column A.

(2) Aggregate income information in Column B.

(3) Aggregate gross value in Column C.

(4) Transaction as to the Aggregate Ownership Arrangement itself in Column D.

On the following page is an illustration of reporting an Aggregate Ownership Arrangement. On the lines following the line for the Aggregate Ownership Arrangement, each separate asset owned by, or in, the arrangement during the reporting period must be reported as follows:

(1) The identity of the separate asset in Column A, preceded by a dash to show that it is part of the aggregate entry;

---

[1] Of course, if the reporting person wishes to provide the income and end of period value with respect to each separate asset, it is permissible to do so.

(2) Column B, income information, is left blank;

(3) Column C, gross value, is left blank; and

(4) Transactions of the Aggregate Ownership Arrangement as to the separate assets are reported in Column D.

If the Aggregate Ownership Arrangement was utilized for a substantial number of assets and there is available clear documentation of all required information, the reporting person may apply to the Committee for leave to report the assets in an alternate manner. Any request should be made sufficiently in advance of the filing deadline to permit careful consideration and discussion with the reporting person.

Notes to filer:

____ Did you complete the appropriate columns for each asset required to be individually listed in a trust, estate, investment club, or other similar financial arrangement?

B. Trusts

The reporting of a position in Part I as trustee, executor, administrator, custodian, or any similar position requires a listing in Part VII of the assets involved if either you, your spouse, or any of your dependent children (1) has a beneficial interest in the estate or fund with which you are associated, or (2) controls the purchase, sale, or other disposition of the estate or fund.

A reporting person must also report all trusts[2] in which he or she, his or her spouse or dependent child has a beneficial interest. However, a reporting person does not have to report a contingent interest in a trust if the reporter has no control over the assets of the trust. An interest is contingent if there is no present right or ability to any income or principal, and the future is uncertain either by survivorship or otherwise.

A reporting person who is required to report a trust, etc. must report the separate assets of the trust or estate as an Aggregate Ownership Arrangement discussed above. However, the reporting person need not report the separate assets of a trust:

(1) which was not created directly by the reporting person, his spouse, or any dependent child; and

[2] Except, for employees other than judges, the assets of a qualified blind trust which is approved by the Committee need not be reported. See the discussion in paragraph C.

(2) the holdings or sources of income, of which the person, his spouse, or any dependent child have no knowledge. Section 102(f)(2).

If a trust has been established to receive proceeds of a life insurance policy, the insured person is still living, and the trust has no asset valued at more than $1,000, it should not be listed as an asset in Part VII, but if the trust was disclosed in Part I, the filer should include a note in Part VIII that it is an "unfunded trust." Similarly, a trust whose sole asset is a term life insurance policy need not be listed in Part VII, as term insurance is not regarded as an investment asset, but if the trust was disclosed in Part I, the filer should include a note in Part VIII explaining that it is an "unfunded trust."

C. Qualified Blind Trust (Employees Other Than Judges)

A qualified blind trust is subject to special rules. Section 102(f).

The reporting person, other than a judge, is not required to report in Column A the individual assets of a "qualified blind trust." Section 102(f)(1). The effect of the Code of Conduct for United States Judges (Canon 3(c)(2)) precludes qualified blind trusts for judges, their spouses, and dependent children. Other judicial employees may own beneficial interests in qualified blind trusts as defined and conditioned in the pertinent statutes. Judicial employees considering the establishment of a qualified blind trust are directed specifically to Section 102(f)(3)(D), which requires approval by the Committee on Financial Disclosure.

Commentary

Where the filer or spouse has exercised a power of attorney with respect to any assets, all investment assets subject to that power should be reported in Part VII.

The following are examples of statutory guidelines on related subjects extracted from The Codes of Conduct For Judges and Judicial Employees. These guidelines should provide assistance as to the propriety of disclosing certain financial interests.

(1) "Financial interest" means ownership of a legal or equitable interest, however small. (Canon 3(C)(3)(c).)

(2) Ownership in a mutual or common investment fund that holds securities is not a "financial interest" in such securities unless the judge participates in the management of the fund. (Canon 3(C)(3)(c)(i).)

(3) An office in an educational, religious, charitable, fraternal, or civic organization is not a "financial interest" in securities held by the organization. (Canon 3(C)(3)(c)(ii).)

(4) A policy holder in a mutual insurance company, a depositor in a mutual savings association, or owner of government securities has a "financial interest," if the outcome of any proceeding in which the filer participates could substantially affect the value of the interests. (Canon 3(C)(3)(c)(iii) and (iv).)

(5) An interest in a limited partnership designed to engage in particular investment strategies can fall within the concept of a "common investment fund" when the judge has no control or influence over the general partner or over the investment decisions. The investment vehicle is similar to a mutual fund. (Compendium § 3.1-3(e) (2003).)

(6) Judge has a "financial interest" in each of the named underlying equity securities when the judge's IRA owns units of an investment vehicle which holds 15 named corporations, the portfolio is not actively managed, and it is not contemplated the securities will be sold or exchanged prior to termination of the investment vehicle in ten years. Investment vehicle does not qualify as "mutual fund or common investment fund" under Canon 3C. (Compendium § 3.1-3(f) (2003).)

(7) A law firm's KEOGH plan or 401k plan managed by the firm, small number of participants, ready access to investment information does not qualify for the "common fund" exception. (Compendium § 3.1-3(c) (2003).)

(8) A law firm's retirement fund qualifies for the "common investment fund" exception where the financial interest is indirect (due to the number of participants and the size and diversity of investments), directed investment by participants is not available, and the participants do not know and cannot easily find out about a fund's portfolio, which turns over frequently. (Compendium § 3.1-3(c-1) (2003).)

VIII. Explanatory Comments

Use this part to add information clarifying other portions of the report. Of particular importance is any information, such as a reference to opinions of the Committee on Codes of Conduct and actions of a Judicial Council, that bears on possible conflicts of interest or problems under the Code of Conduct for United States Judges. Also use this part to explain any apparent inconsistencies between the current report and past reports.

Place explanatory comments either with the item or in Part VIII that will facilitate "tracing" items from one report to the next. For example, indicate if an asset has a different name from that used in the prior report because of a reorganization or change of name.

Use attachment pages if more space is needed.

Examples of Notes in Part VIII

VIII. ADDITIONAL INFORMATION OR EXPLANATIONS (Indicate part of Report.)

1) Part VII, page 1, line 3 - Value based on comparison to sale prices of nearby properties.
2) Part VII, page 2, line 18: This asset was acquired through my marriage.
3) Values and income of assets listed on page 2, lines 21-24 of previous report have declined below reporting value (asset on line 24 now bankrupt).

IX. Certification and Signature

The certifications provided on the form cover (1) a certification that the report is accurate, true, and complete as to all information required by the Act to be reported; and (2) a certification that earned income from outside employment and honoraria and the acceptance of gifts that have been reported are in compliance with the provisions of applicable laws and regulations.

The original report that is to be filed with the Committee must bear the original signature of the reporting person; the other three copies may be copies of the signed original. At least one copy of an amended return or of a clarifying letter responding to a Committee inquiry must bear the original signature of the reporting person; all other copies shall be copies of the signed original. The signature of the reporting person may be excused only during a period of physical or mental incapacity of that person.

Promptly upon discovery that an error has been made in a report, amend the report by one of the methods explained on page 4.

DOJ_NMG_0143022

COMPLIANCE AND SANCTIONS

Compliance with filing and reporting requirements is monitored pursuant to 5 U.S.C. app. § 106.

One who knowingly and willfully falsifies or fails to file or report any information required under the Act is subject to civil and criminal sanctions. Section 104(a).

ETHICAL STANDARDS

The disclosure requirements and exemptions from disclosure contained in the Act neither define nor limit the standards imposed by the Code of Conduct for United States Judges and other rules of the Judicial Conference of the United States or the statutory provisions for disqualification or recusal.

For example, disclosure of financial interests under the Act is required only for interests exceeding a stated minimum amount of value and only with respect to certain members of a person's family, whereas 28 U.S.C. § 455(b)(4) applies to financial interests without regard to amount and 28 U.S.C. § 455(b)(5) applies to participation in litigation by a person within the third degree of relationship to the judge. Similarly, the Act exempts from disclosure matters relating to campaign receipts and campaign disbursements, most of which would be prohibited under the Code of Judicial Conduct for United States Judges, which also precludes qualified blind trusts for judges.

PUBLIC ACCESS

Financial Disclosure Reports are public documents, open to inspection and copying at the office of the Committee on Financial Disclosure. Reports will be made available to the public in accordance with the regulations of the Judicial Conference of the United States on Access to Financial Disclosure Reports Filed by Judges and Judiciary Employees Under the Ethics in Government Act of 1978, as amended. Sections 105(a) and (b)(1). However, § 105(b)(3)(A) of the Ethics in Government Act of 1978, as amended, does not require the immediate and unconditional availability of reports filed if a finding is made by the Committee on Financial Disclosure, in consultation with the United States Marshals Service, that revealing personal and sensitive information contained on the report could endanger the filer.

When an annual report is filed, each filer shall, in a cover letter to the Committee, request redactions of any information required to be disclosed in the report, if the filer believes the release of the information to the public could endanger the filer or the filer's family. A filer may also request redaction after he or she receives notice of a request for his or her reports. Such requests should be submitted in accordance with Judicial Conference regulations specifying the material sought to be redacted and stating in detail the reasons justifying redaction. Each request for redaction will be reviewed by the Committee in accordance with Section 105 of the Act and the regulations of the Judicial Conference. Information approved for redaction must still be disclosed when filing a report. Redactions will be made by the Committee staff prior to release.

A report will be made available only to a person who completes the AO Form 10A, Request for Examination of Report Filed by a Judicial Officer or Employee, in writing.

It shall be unlawful for any person to obtain or use a report--

A) for any unlawful purpose;

B) for any commercial purpose other than by news and communications media for dissemination to the general public;

C) for determining or establishing the credit rating of any person; or

D) for use directly or indirectly, in the solicitation of money for any political, charitable, or other purpose. Section 105(c)(1).

The Attorney General may bring a civil action against any person who obtains or uses a report for any prohibited purpose described above. The court in which such action is brought may assess against such person a penalty in any amount not to exceed $10,000. Such remedy shall be in addition to any other remedy available under statutory or common law. Section 105(c)(2).

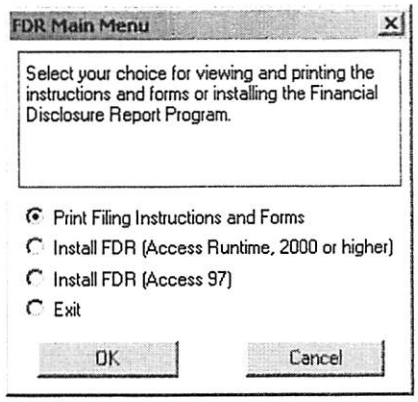
Contents - Financial Disclosure Report CD

The enclosed CD has been revised to contain copies of the financial disclosure filing instructions, report form, and other documents that were previously provided in a paper format. You may view the documents on your computer, print the documents, or save the documents to the hard drive on your computer. In addition, the CD allows you to install a copy of an updated version of the financial disclosure software issued January 2, 2005, and is designed to assist you in filing your financial disclosure report. The program is written in Microsoft Access and designed to work with Microsoft Access versions Access 97 and later. If you do not have Microsoft Access available on your machine, the program will install a runtime version of Microsoft Access that will allow you to install and use the FDR software. The program was designed to replace the older FoxPro for Windows-based software (FDR2001) which does not run on some of the newer computers used by filers. The CD allows the installation of the program on your computer and will copy the data from last year's report to assist you in completing the form.



Using the CD

Follow these step-by-step instructions to use the Financial Disclosure Report CD on your computer:

(1) Insert CD in your CD drive.
(2) Use your mouse to click on the Start button at the bottom left hand corner of your desktop
(3) Select Run and press the <Enter> key
(4) Type D:\ or E:\ menu.exe and press the <Enter> key

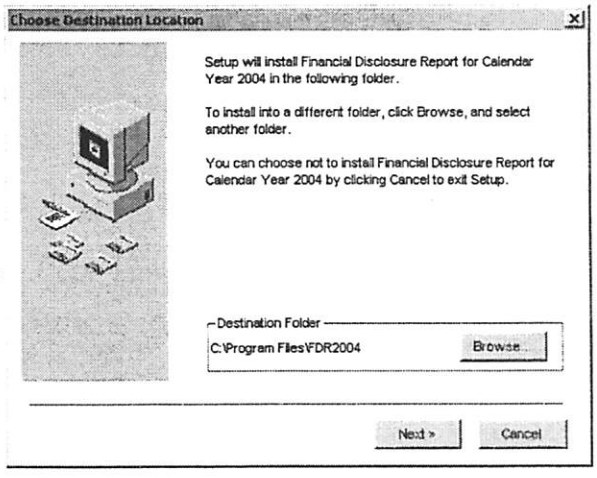
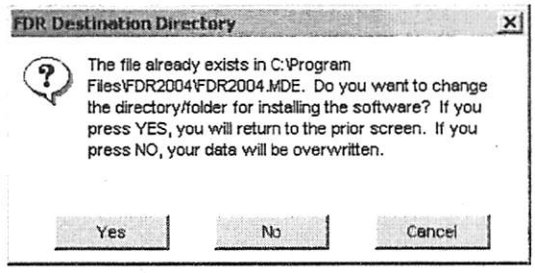
When you are finished viewing or printing the document, exit Adobe Acrobat and return to the FDR Instructions and Forms Menu. If you wish to install the FDR software or exit the CD, select <Return to the Main Menu>.



If you wish to install the FDR software, select the install option from the Main Menu and click your mouse on the <OK> button.

The setup program will display a series of screens that will assist you in installing the software. Move from screen to screen using the menu buttons at the bottom of the screen to complete the setup and installation of the program.



During installation you may choose a directory or program manager group other than the default. Click your mouse on the Browse button and select the folder where you would like the program installed. DO NOT install the program in the directory containing the version of the program that you used last year (normally C:\Program Files\FDR2003 or FDR2001). The installation program will overwrite your data files and you will not be able to incorporate the data from your previous report into the windows program. Select the <Next> button to proceed with the installation of the software from the CD to your computer.

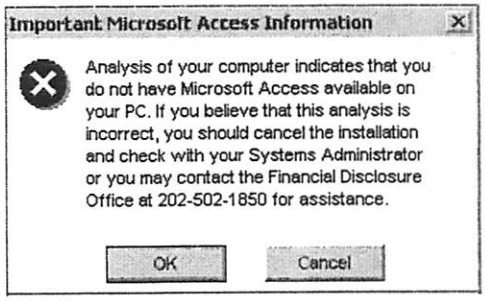
The setup program will search your computer to determine whether you have already installed the FDR software into the folder c:\program files\FDR2004. If you have, the program will warn you that any reinstallation to this folder will overwrite your data. You will have an opportunity to change the folder, exit the program (since installation is not needed) or overwrite the data in that folder.

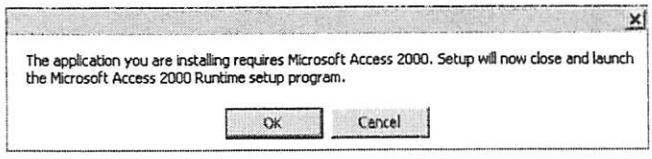
If you continue with the installation, the program will examine your computer and determine which version of Microsoft Access you are using: Access 97, Access 2000, or Access 2002 (XP) or higher. Once the search is complete, the screen will display a box stating what it has found. Press <OK> to continue the installation. If the search program does not find a version of Microsoft Access available to your computer, it will display a message informing you of this fact and give you the option of installing a "runtime" version of Microsoft Access 2000 that will allow you to run the FDR2004 program (See Installing the Runtime Version below).

If you have Access 97 on your computer, a screen will display instructing you to install the Access 97 files. If you have Access 2000, Access 2002, or Access 2003 available on your computer, the setup program will choose those files to install. Select <OK> to continue.



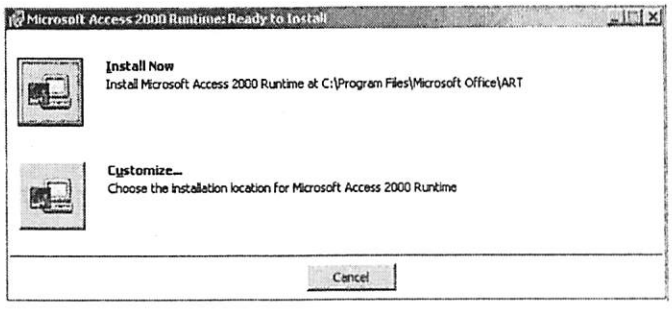
Once installation is complete, the program will add an icon to the program manager group you designated above and add a program icon on your desktop. The icon will read "FDR" if you are using Access 97 and "FDR2004" if you are using Access 2000 or higher.

DOJ_NMG_0143037



Installing the Runtime Version of Microsoft Access

If Microsoft Access is not available on your computer, you may install a "runtime" copy of Access from the CD that will allow you to run the FDR2004 program. Your court or office does not need to buy a copy of Access or purchase a license.



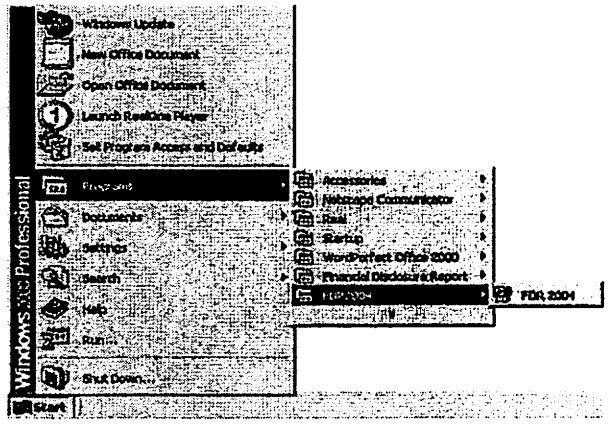
If you believe the analysis is incorrect, press the <Cancel> button. If you believe the analysis is correct, click the <OK> button and the following message will appear.

The program will inform you that it is preparing to install the program and show you a screen that gives you the option of a routine or customized installation. Most filers should choose <Install Now>.

The install program will inform you when the installation is complete. Press <OK> and your computer will automatically reboot. After your system has restarted, MS Access 2000 Runtime will continue to complete the setup. Again, please stand by, as this will take several minutes.

After the MS Access 2000 Runtime setup is completed, the FDR setup screen will automatically appear. Follow the instructions on the screen as outlined above in Using the CD on page 1. NOTE: The MS Access 2000 Runtime software is a one-time installation. If you need to reinstall the FDR software, follow the instructions for Using the CD on page 1.

The Access runtime program does not create a desktop icon for the FDR software. You can create an icon or run the program from desktop menu using the START button.



To create the shortcut on your desktop:

Step 1. Right-click the mouse;
Step 2. Select "New" then "Shortcut";
Step 3. Type "c:\program files\fdr2004\fdr2004.mde" - this is the default path to the FDR application or the path you created;
Step 4. Select or type a name to appear on desktop;
Step 5. Press the "OK" button. The icon will appear on your desktop.

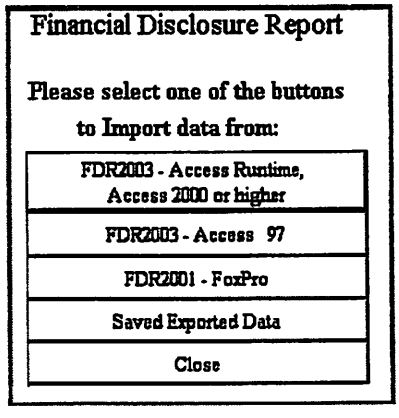
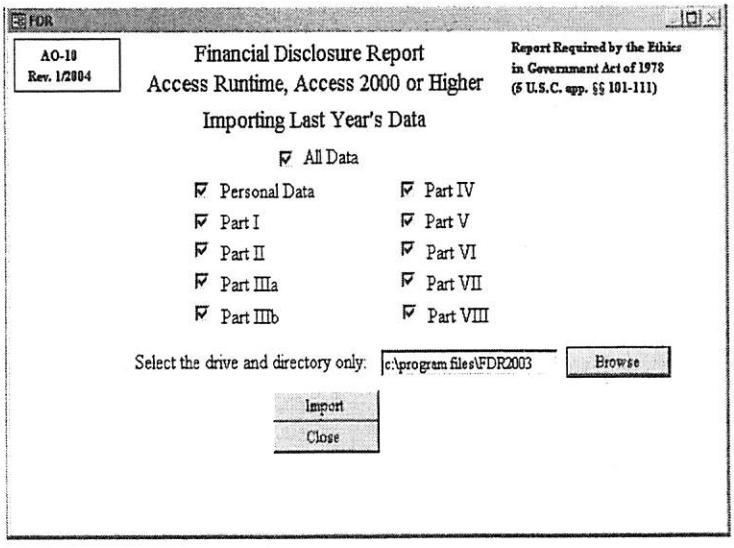
Starting the FDR Program

You can start the program by double clicking on the FDR icon on your desktop or using the Start button on your desktop and selecting programs as shown.



Importing Last Year's Data

When you first enter the program, you will see the following screen with five menu buttons that enable you to open the form, import last year's data, preview/print the form, export your data, or exit the program. If you want to use the data from your last report to assist you in completing this year's report, choose that option by clicking on the <Import Data> button.



The following screen will appear to ask you to select the program used to file your last report and import that data into the FDR2004 program. The program automatically selects the default path for the program you used to file your last report. If you used the runtime version of the software which installed Access 2000 Runtime on your PC, select <FDR2003-Access Runtime, Access 2000 or higher2000> button. The Access 97 version can also be found in c:\program files\fdr2003. If you used the older FoxPro program, the data is normally in the c:\fdr2001 folder. Note that the <SavedData> button is a new feature and will only work with data saved from the FDR2004 report program.

Once you select the program that you used to complete your last report, the following screen will appear. Check the <All Data> box to import all of the data from your last report or check selected parts. Click on the <Import> button to copy the data.

The FDR2004 program allows you to re-import the data from your last report if you selected the wrong program. However, each new import will write over any data that was previously imported or entered in a particular section of the database.

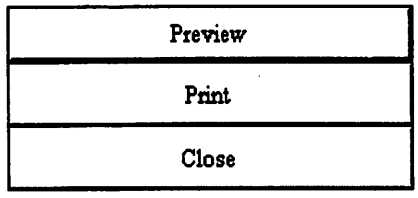
D. Entering Data in Part VIII, Additional Comments

Use this screen to add or change any comments you may have regarding any entry in any other part of the form.

Several keys on your keyboard are available to assist you when entering text in this Part and apply to Part VIII only:

<Insert> Toggles between insert and typeover mode. Characters that you type will obliterate any characters that are already typed. For insert mode, the cursor will appear as a box. Any characters you type will "push" existing characters to the right.

<Home> Moves the cursor to the beginning of the current line.



<Page Up>	Moves the cursor to the top line in the box. If there are more lines that are typed in above the first line in the box, then it will scroll up the previous fourteen lines (or less) of text to display the previous "boxful" of text.
<Delete>	Deletes one character at a time. Move the cursor to the beginning of the character you want to delete then press the delete key.
<End>	Moves the cursor to the end of the current line.
<Page Down>	Moves the cursor to the bottom line in the box. If you have more than fourteen lines of text in the box, it will automatically scroll the box down fourteen lines (or the rest of the lines in your explanation if it is less than fourteen lines) to reveal the next "boxful" of text.
<Up Arrow>	Moves the cursor up one line.
<Left Arrow>	Moves the cursor one character to the left.
<Down Arrow>	Moves the cursor down one line.
<Right Arrow>	Moves the cursor one character to the right.
<Shift>	If you hold the <Shift> key down and use one of the keys above, you can highlight multiple lines of text for deletion then press the delete key.
<Ctrl C>	Copy. If the data you want to copy is in another program, switch to that program. Select (highlight) the item you want to copy. - Click Edit then Copy on the Edit menu at the top of the program; or - Press the CTRL and C keys to copy data. This places your data in the Clipboard until you paste the data.

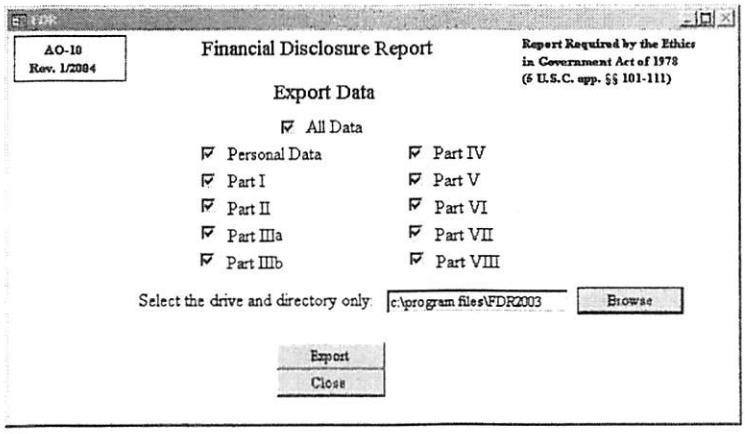
If you press the <Preview> button, a Preview sub-menu appears with five buttons enabling you to choose the parts to preview.



If you press the <Print> button, a Print sub-menu appears with six buttons enabling you to choose all or parts of the report to print. If the report does not print on the printer you intended, you may need to change the Windows default printer. To do this, use the Windows Print Manager icon. See your System Manager, or the Microsoft Windows documentation for further information.

Once you have printed, use the close button on the menu to return to the main menu or a particular part of the report for more data entry.

Exporting Your Data

When you press the "Export Data" button, a menu appears. This screen has several options that enable you to select and export all your data or individual parts of the form. It enables you to export your current year's data and save it to the FDR directory. You can then save the file to a diskette and use it on another PC with the FDR software.

DOJ_NMG_0143046

Select the data you wish to export by checking the <All Data> box or any of the individual check boxes.

The program lists the default path to export the current year's data. This file will be saved to your FDR directory as FDR200x_saved.mde in Access 2000 or higher or FDR97_saved.mde in Access 97. NOTE: Please do not change the file name. The software uses this file name to import the saved data.

Once the export file is created, you can copy it to a disk or CD, and then import the data on another computer where the FDR 2004 program is installed.

REGULATIONS OF THE JUDICIAL CONFERENCE OF THE UNITED STATES ON ACCESS TO FINANCIAL DISCLOSURE REPORTS FILED BY JUDGES AND JUDICIARY EMPLOYEES UNDER THE ETHICS IN GOVERNMENT ACT OF 1978, AS AMENDED

1.0 Purpose.

These regulations govern access to the financial disclosure reports filed by judges and judiciary employees under the Ethics in Government Act of 1978, as amended (5 U.S.C. app. §§ 101-111).

2.0 Application.

These regulations apply to the processing of all requests for copies of the financial disclosure reports of judges and judiciary employees maintained by the Administrative Office of the United States Courts.

3.0 Responsibility.

(a) The Judicial Conference of the United States has delegated to the Committee on Financial Disclosure the responsibility for implementing the financial disclosure requirements for judges and judicial employees under the Ethics in Government Act of 1978, as amended.

(b) The Committee on Financial Disclosure will monitor the release of financial disclosure reports to ensure compliance with the statute and the Committee's guidance. As provided in § 5.2(d), the Committee will review and within the Committee's discretion approve or disapprove any requests for the redaction of statutorily mandated information where the release of the information could endanger a filer. It will review and approve or disapprove any requests for waiver of costs associated with a request for the release of a financial disclosure report. It will also provide guidance when questions not covered in these regulations arise. The Committee's Subcommittee on Public Access and Security is delegated the authority to act for the Committee where necessary to implement the provisions of these regulations.

(c) The Administrative Office of the United States Courts is responsible for processing and maintaining financial disclosure reports in accordance with the statute and these regulations.

4.0 Procedure.

(a) The financial disclosure reports filed by judges and judiciary employees are maintained by the Administrative Office of the United States Courts. In accordance with the statute, the reports are kept for six years, after which they are destroyed.

DOJ_NMG_0143048

(b) Section 105(b)(2) requires that all requests to examine or for a copy of a financial disclosure report must be in writing and contain the following:

(1) the requester's name, occupation, and address;

(2) the name and address of any other person or organization on whose behalf the inspection or copy is requested; and

(3) that the requester is aware of the prohibitions with regard to obtaining or viewing the report.

4.1 Requesting a Report (AO Form 10A).

(a) Requesters must provide the required information on AO Form 10A, Request for Examination of Report Filed by a Judicial Officer or Judicial Employee. The form must contain a list of the filers whose reports are requested, be signed and dated by the requester, and contain the information delineated in paragraph 4.0 above.

(b) Each AO Form 10A received that results in the release or viewing of a report will be placed in the file and will be made available to the public throughout the period during which the report is made available to the public, except as provided in § 4.4.

4.2 Request to View a Report.

Financial disclosure reports may be viewed in the Article III Judges Division by appointment. Appointments must be made at least 5 working days in advance. Staff will provide the requester with a duplicate redacted copy of the filer's file. In no case will the original file be removed from the file room for review by a member of the public.

4.3 Cost.

Requesters will be charged $.20 per page to cover reproduction and mailing costs. A copy of the requested report may be furnished without charge or at a reduced charge if it is determined that waiver or reduction of the fee is in the public interest. Requests for waiver must be presented in writing to the Committee on Financial Disclosure.

4.4 Notification of a Request.

(a) The office of the Committee on Financial Disclosure will immediately notify the filer when an AO Form 10A is received requesting the release of the filer's financial disclosure reports and will provide each filer with a copy of the requester's AO-Form 10A.

(b) When a request involves a filer who is the subject of an ongoing criminal or ethics investigation by the U.S. Department of Justice or a committee of the Judicial Conference or a circuit judicial council, the Committee will not notify a filer of the release of a financial disclosure report where the originator of the request makes an affirmative request that the filer not be notified. The Committee staff will coordinate with the Chair on the release of reports in connection with such investigations.

5.0 Limitations on Release.

5.1 Incomplete or Improper Request.

Under section 105 of the Ethics in Government Act, financial disclosure reports will not be released to any individual who fails to properly complete the AO Form 10A or pay assessed costs.

5.2 Security.

(a) Committee staff will take every step to ensure the privacy and security of judges and judiciary employees required to file a financial disclosure report in accordance with the statute and the guidance provided by the Committee on Financial Disclosure. The reports will be maintained in a secure file room.

(b) The staff will not release or allow the viewing of any report until notice has been given to the filer, except as provided in § 4.4.

(c) In accordance with Committee direction, Committee staff will continue to monitor compliance with the Ethics in Government Act of 1978, as amended, while minimizing security risks by redacting information not required by the Act including without limitation:

(1) spouse's and dependents' names;

(2) home addresses;

(3) social security numbers;

(4) financial account and bank account numbers;

(5) street addresses of rental properties, financial institutions, and business properties;

(6) ownership codes; and

(7) filer's signature.

(d) A report that may be disseminated to the public after release to a requester may be redacted pursuant to Section 105 of the Act to prevent public disclosure of personal or sensitive information that could endanger the filer directly, or indirectly by endangering another, if possessed by a member of the public hostile to the filer. The procedure for determining whether redaction is appropriate shall be as follows:

(1) When an annual report is filed, the filer shall request redactions believed to be appropriate before release of a report that may be disseminated to the public. Requests for redaction may also be made after a filer receives a notification of a request under § 4.4.

(2) Reports that will not be considered as ones that may be disseminated to the public after release to a requester include but are not limited to:

(i) reports released upon request to appropriate committees of the Senate or House of Representatives;

(ii) reports released upon request to appropriate officials of the Executive Branch.

In the case of (i) and (ii), redaction of the filer's signature pursuant to § 5.2(c)(7) shall not occur if so indicated by the requester.

(3) The filer shall state with specificity what material is sought to be redacted. The filer shall also state in detail the reasons justifying redaction. These reasons may include, but are not limited to:

(i) the purposes and need for an ongoing protective detail provided by the United States Marshals Service;

(ii) particular threats or inappropriate communications;

(iii) involvement in a high threat trial or appeal; or

(iv) certain information on the form could endanger the filer directly or indirectly if possessed by a member of the public hostile to the filer.

(4) The Committee will determine, in consultation with the United States Marshals Service, whether information sought to be redacted could, if disseminated to the public, endanger the filer directly or indirectly and grant or deny the request accordingly. Information that could facilitate the financial harassment of a filer, such as identity theft, may be deemed information that could endanger a filer. However, no redaction will be granted that eliminates disclosure of the existence, rather than extent, of an interest in an entity that would disqualify the filer from serving as a judge in litigation involving that entity, unless disclosure of that interest would reveal the location of a residence of the filer or a family member, reveal the place of employment of the filer or a family member, or might increase an existing danger to a filer based on circumstances described in (d)(3)(i)-

(iii) of this Section. The Committee may redact material without a request from a filer if it has received credible evidence that the release of information contained in a financial report could endanger the filer.

(5) A filer aggrieved by a denial of a request for redaction may petition the Special Redaction Review Panel of the Judicial Conference of the United States for review within 10 days of notification of the denial. The Special Review Panel shall issue a determination promptly. The term of the Special Redaction Review panel shall expire on December 31, 2001.

(e) Information may be redacted from a report in accordance with such finding to the extent necessary to protect the judge or judiciary employee who filed the report, and the redactions will be made for as long as the reasons for redacting the report exist.

(f) The Committee staff will notify a filer when a report is actually released or reviewed and provide the filer with a copy of the released report with any redactions. The staff will maintain a copy of the redacted material for as long as the original report is maintained.

(g) A request for redaction and its supporting documents, except for copies of the financial disclosure report and any amendments thereto, are considered confidential and will only be used to determine whether to grant a request for redaction. Such documents are not considered to be a part of any report releasable under section 105(b)(1) of the Act.

6.0 Use of Reports.

(a) Section 105 of the Act provides that it is unlawful for any person to obtain or use a report:

(1) for any unlawful purpose;

(2) for any commercial purpose other than by news and communications media for dissemination to the general public;

(3) for determining or establishing the credit rating of any individual; or

(4) for use directly or indirectly, in the solicitation of money for any political, charitable, or other purpose.

(b) The Attorney General may bring a civil action against any person who obtains or uses a report for any purpose prohibited by this paragraph. The court in which such action is brought may assess against such person a penalty in any amount not to exceed $10,000. Such remedy may be in addition to any other remedy available under statutory or common law.

7.0 Reporting Requirements.

The Committee on Financial Disclosure will report to the Judicial Conference on an annual basis the following:

(a) the total number of reports in which required information is redacted under exercise of the authority delineated in paragraph 5.2(d);

(b) the total number of individuals whose reports have been redacted under exercise of the authority in paragraph 5.2(d); and

(c) the types of threats against filers whose reports are redacted, if appropriate.

The Conference will provide copies of the report to the Committees on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives and of the Senate.
